ON several occasions we have in these columns prescribed a one per cent. solution of sulphate of copper (bluestone) as an effective destroyer of stomach worms in sheep and lambs and as having some effect upon tapeworms. The dose advised has been from three quarters of an ounce of the solution to three and a half ounces for an adult sheep, to be given after withholding feed for twenty-four hours and to be repeated in ten days.

Now comes the Oklahoma Agricultural Experiment Station veterinarians with the pleasing announcement that they have hit upon a more effective treatment than this sulphate of copper solution, or the gasolene mixture previously so much lauded. They first gave the sulphate of copper solution at the rate of 50 cubic centimeters for lambs under one year of age and 100 cubic centimeters for adult sheep. A cubic centimeter is about 15 drops. The dose was repeated after three or four days and the treatment was found fairly effective. Then other lambs and sheep were treated with a mixture of one gram (15 grains) of powdered sulphate of copper and one gram of powdered tobacco leaves or snuff in 100 cubic centimeters of water. This treatment resulted in 95 to 100 per cent efficiency for stomach worms, 75 to 100 per cent for tapeworms and 100 per cent for hookworms in experimental lambs. The tobacco should be steeped over night and the copper sulphate added before drenching. The dosage is the same as for copper sulphate solution alone.

The latter treatment certainly is well worth trying and every reader of COMFORT should, so far as possible, keep his lambs and adult sheep free from worms which prevent thrift and normal development and when present in large numbers commonly cause death.

PERIODIC OPHTHALMIA.—I have a fine mare nine years old. In a light moon her eyes become white and she goes blind. She has a colt. Will it have weak eyes? MRS. P. C.

A.—The disease is periodic or recurrent opthalmia, often called "moon blindness," but the changes of the moon have no influence in bringing on or causing attacks of this or any other disease. It is incurable and eventually causes the blindness of one or both eyes from cataract. The tendency to the disease is considered hereditary so that it is unwise to breed from affected stock. There is no certainty, however, that the same disease will affect the foal.

INDIGESTION.—Will you tell me what ailed my cow? She was sick three days and refused to eat, lying with her head on the ground, and passed bloody looking matter from her bowels. I had fed her green clover the day before she was taken sick. Would the milk be fit to use? MRS. M. C.

A.—The cow evidently had an acute attack of indigestion such as commonly proves fatal. The milk may be used if the cow chews her cud normally and has regained her usual appetite and appearance of good health. To be certain that the milk of any cow is safe for use, however, the tubercular test should be applied by a qualified veterinarian. That is the only certain way of doctoring if tuberculosis is present.

PARALYSIS.—What is the matter with my pigs? When they were old enough to drink milk from the trough, and after drinking a while, they would begin to squeal as if something was hurting them, fall over in sort of a fit but did not froth at the mouth. To look at them, one would think they were dead, but they would come to all right. After a time their hind legs drew up in a curve and now they cannot walk and are almost helpless, lying around in the sun, rising up on their feet to eat. They are six months old and weigh about 35 pounds. A. P.

A.—There is practically no likelihood that the affected pigs can be got on their feet or made profitable. They should, therefore, be put out of their misery. Indigestion is the common cause of fits in pigs and worms may be a complication. More careful feeding will have to be done in future. To destroy worms, starve pigs for 24 hours then give in a little slop, for each 50 pounds of body weight, two and one half grains each of santonin and calomel, one dram of freshly powdered areca nut and one half dram of bicarbonate of soda. Repeat the treatment in 10 days.

LAMENESS.—I have a Shetland pony six years old. When I bought him he was sweenied in left shoulder but it didn't seem to bother him much. He is getting lame and I rarely use him. The roads are rough and he is barefooted. MRS. P. C.

A.—Better have the pony shod. At shoeing time the smith may find that the cause of lameness is in the foot. Corns or navicular disease would be a likely cause. Wasting (atrophy) of the muscles, or so-called "sweeney," often is due to chronic foot lameness, rather than sprain of the muscles of the shoulder. In true sweeney, following a sprain when plowing, the lameness soon subsides, but wasting continues. Treatment for wasting consists in the injection of a little tincture of iodin under the skin at points three or four inches apart over the wasted surface. This is done by means of a hypodermic syringe.

WEAK MULE.—Please tell me what is the matter with my three-year-old mule. He has a sluggish appearance and gives out quick. He likes lump salt and drinks lots of water. I feed him on oats, bran and corn. He has plenty of prairie hay but does not gain in flesh. MISS J. M.

A.—The teeth, no doubt, need attention from a veterinarian as many are being shed and others are coming through the gums. Crowns or "shells" of milk teeth may have to be removed, gums lanced over incoming incisors and sharp points filed down. It would also be well to give 20 drops of fluid extract of nux vomica, 60 drops of fluid extract of gentian root and a level teaspoonful of bicarbonate of soda three times daily in a little water.

SCOURS.—How can I cure and prevent scours in a calf? (2) What should a cow test to be a good butter cow? MRS. H. F. B.

A.—Isolate a scouring calf and give it a dose of castor oil in milk. Then give every three or four hours, one to two teaspoonfuls of a mixture of one part of salol and two parts each of subnitrate of bismuth and bicarbonate of soda, in a little milk or water, according to size of calf and severity of attack. Keep all utensils sterilized. Carefully remove foam from milk and feed it blood warm. Make calves drink slowly. (2) The legal standard is 3.5 per cent of butter fat, and 4.5 to 5 per cent is excellent but commonly made by good "butter bred" cows.

WOUND.—I have a mare, two years old, that was cut on barbed wire last November and will not heal. There seems to be a callous each side of the cut, pus forming between. Can you tell me what to do to remove the callous and heal the sore? I have been a subscriber for years. MRS. L. W.

A.—Clip off the hair and wash the wound and surrounding parts. Then do not wash again, but once daily rub in some 10 per cent. oleate of mercury and then dust the part with a mixture of one part each of calomel and subnitrate of bismuth and six parts of boric acid. Keep the mare tied up short while under treatment. Motion prevents rapid healing of such cases.

SWOLLEN THROAT.—A young cat came to the house and it seems to have a goiter. It does not show from the outside. A lump is felt on the throat and the kitten breathes heavily at times. MRS. M. O. A.

A.—Clip off the hair and rub iodin ointment into the swelling once a week. Let the kitten live outdoors as much as possible and feed it raw meat. Do not feed milk warm from the cow. For cats prefer milk that is 12 hours old, and skim it before feeding.

DISEASED HOG.—Can you tell me what ailed my hog? When butchered and opened, a sack as large as a football and filled with blood and a growth as large as two hands looked like liver only darker. Was the meat fit to use? I threw it away. The blood in the sack was offensive. F. L. M.

A.—You do not indicate the exact location of the sac and growth but we fancy you mean that it was in the scrotum, and if so it resulted from castration and would be known as a "scirrhus cord." As the blood had a foul odor, we think you were wise not to use the meat, but it is possible to operate successfully for the removal of such a growth so that on recovery the animal may be fitted for slaughter and the meat safely used. If the sac was found internally, the meat certainly was unfit for use.

GARGET.—I would like to know what is the matter with my cow and what to do for her. Her udder and teats swell and cake but not all over at the same time. O. R.

A.—The disease is inflammation of the mammary gland or udder, technically termed mammitis and commonly "garget" or "caked bag." We should advise you to dry off the milk secretion as soon as it becomes unprofitable and then fit the cow for the butcher. It rarely pays to treat such chronic cases and they usually end in a ruined udder. In some instances tuberculosis of the udder is present. A cow so affected should be isolated as the disease sometimes spreads to other cows. Read answers under title of "garget" in previous issues of this paper.

RINGBONE.—I have a horse, twelve years old, that became lame three months ago and is still lame. The soreness is above his hoof, just below his ankle. J. G.

A.—Lameness from ringbone of a front pastern usually requires unnerving by a skilled surgeon. If you can rest the horse for two months, however, the lameness possibly may subside. If you keep cold wet swabs upon the part every day for a month and then clip off the hair and apply a blister twice in the following month. Obtain the blister from a veterinarian with instructions for use.

SKIN DISEASE.—I have a cow that has one kind of skin trouble. It looks more like mange than anything I know. The skin is thick and rough in places. J. W. T.

A.—Give the affected parts one thorough scrubbing with soap and hot water containing a tablespoonful of coal tar dip to the gallon. Afterward rub in dry flowers of sulphur two or three times a week.

Large Cows Excel in Yield

Cow-testing records based on 38,532 dairy cows from 710 cow testing associations are being analyzed by specialists of the Dairy Division, United States Department of Agriculture. The tabulations have brought out a number of interesting relations between milk production, butterfat test, butterfat production, and income over cost of feed. The larger cows excelled the medium and small cows in production of both milk and butterfat.

The average annual milk production of all the animals was 5,936 pounds per cow, and the average butterfat production 246 pounds. These figures are considerably larger than the average for the United States, indicating that dairymen who are members of cow-testing associations either dispose of their poorest cows or else make them more profitable by better feeding and handling.

What Nuxated Iron Is Made From

Sworn Statement of Composition of Its Formula

It increases the strength and endurance of delicate, nervous, run-down folks in two weeks' time in many instances.

The Board of Directors have authorized the broadest publication of the sworn statement of the composition of Nuxated Iron, one of the most widely used tonic, strength and blood builders in the world, so that the public may examine it for themselves and judge as to its merits.

It is conservatively estimated that this remarkable formula is now being used by over 3,000,000 people annually in America alone. Among those who have used and strongly endorse it are many physicians formerly connected with well-known hospitals, former United States Senators, members of Congress, and former Health Officials.

Newspapers everywhere are invited to copy this statement for the benefit of their readers. It is suggested that physicians make a record of it and keep it in their offices so that they may intelligently answer questions of patients concerning it. Everybody is advised to cut it out and keep it. A copy of the actual sworn statement will be sent to anyone who desires such. It is as follows:

Iron Peptonate (Special specific Standard) Quantity given below.
Sodium Glycerophosphates U.S.P. (Monsanto.)
Calcium Glycerophosphates U.S.P. (Monsanto.)
P. E. Nux Vomica U.S.P.
Cascarin Bitter.
Magnesium Carbonate
Po. Ginger U.S.P.
Oil Cassia Cinnamon U.S.P.
Calcium Carbonate Precip. U. S. P.

Each dose of two tablets of Nuxated Iron contains one and one-half grains of organic iron in the form of iron peptonate of a special specific standard which in our opinion possesses superior qualities to any other known form of iron. By using other makes of Iron Peptonate we could have put the same quantity of actual iron in the tablets at less than one-fourth the cost to us, and by using metallic iron we could have accomplished the same thing at less than one-twelfth the cost; but by so doing we must have most certainly impaired their therapeutic efficacy. Glycerophosphates used in Nuxated Iron is one of the most expensive tonic ingredients known. It is especially recommended to build up the nerve force and thereby increase brain power, as glycerophosphates are said to contain phosphorus in a state very similar to that in which it is found in the nerve and brain cells of Man.

As will be seen from the above, two important ingredients of Nuxated Iron (Iron Peptonate and Glycerophosphates) are very expensive products as compared with most other tonics.

Under such circumstances the temptation to adulteration and substitution by unscrupulous persons, is very great and the public is hereby warned to be careful and see every bottle is plainly labeled "Nuxated Iron," by the Due Health Laboratories, Paris, London, and Detroit, U. S. A., as this is the only genuine article. If you have taken other forms of iron without success, this does not prove Nuxated Iron will not help you. We guarantee satisfaction to every purchaser or your money will be refunded.

In regard to the value of Nuxated Iron, Dr. A. J. Newman, late Police Surgeon of the City of Chicago, and former House Surgeon Jefferson Park Hospital, Chicago, says it has proven through his own tests of it to excel any preparation he has ever used for creating red blood, building up the nerves and strengthening the muscles. Dr. J. W. Armistead, Grove Hill, Ala., Graduate of the University of Alabama School of Medicine, Mobile, 1883, says: "In the cases I used Nuxated Iron I have found more beneficial results than from any preparation I have ever used in 34 years' practice." Dr. R. B. Baugh, Polkville, Miss., graduate of the Memphis Hospital College, Memphis, 1898, says: "I always prescribe Nuxated Iron where a reconstructive tonic is indicated." Nuxated Iron often increases the strength and endurance of delicate, nervous, rundown folks in two weeks' time.

MANUFACTURERS' NOTE: Nuxated Iron is not a secret remedy, but one which is well known to druggists everywhere. Unlike the older inorganic iron products, it is easily assimilated, does not injure the teeth, make them black, nor upset the stomach. Nuxated Iron is not recommended for use in cases of acute illness, but only as a tonic, strength and blood builder. (In case of illness always consult your family physician and be guided by his advice.) If in doubt as to whether or not you need a tonic, ask your doctor, as we do not wish to sell you Nuxated Iron if you do not require it. If you should use it and it does not help you, notify us and we will return your money. It is sold by all druggists. Due Health Laboratories Detroit, Mich.

The Family Doctor

The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be taken to your local doctor.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

MRS. H. C. D., Brooklyn, N. Y.—Catarrh covers a multitude of sins, and no one remedy may be effective but, on the whole, Dobell's solution, used in full strength as a spray and gargle will help, if not cure, the disease. If you have an obstructive catarrh, of course an operation is indicated and no cure is possible without operation in a case of this kind. Possibly you have also enlarged tonsils affecting the throat. These should be removed, as well.

MRS. A. M., St. Joseph, R. I.—Your trouble is either rheumatism or neuritis. You should see some dentist and have the teeth looked after, as there may be some local source of infection. Also, the tonsils should be examined for the same purpose. As a remedy, you might use five-grain tablets of salicylate of soda, one tablet after each meal, for a while. Also drink plenty of good spring water—two quarts a day.

MISS L. B., Draketon, Ga.—You need to have your eyes examined for glasses at once. Eye strain always causes styes, and proper lenses will remove the cause of the local irritation that leads up to styes or other inflammations of the lids.

MRS. C. A. S., Boyd, Mont.—Blood-pressure is only a relative term for the given individual, and is only determined in a given case by several examinations. In other words, the blood-pressure for one person would have no relation to the blood-pressure of another individual of the same age and condition. The causes of high blood-pressure are age; excessive drinking over long periods; eating too much and too rich foods; taking too little exercise, etc. Maybe your blood-pressure is normal for you, as you seem well and seem to know how to eat and take care of yourself in general.

MISS E. Z., Stratton, Colo.—The internal piles should have operative attention at once. There is no other way to stop the hemorrhage and also cure the condition.

MRS. H. P., Pond Creek, Okla.—Use liquid vaseline, to which has been added menthol and ichthyol, as a spray to the nose and throat. You add ten grains of the ichthyol and five grains of menthol to the ounce of liquid vaseline.

MRS. V. M. B., Chariton, Ind.—You may have chronic appendicitis. Better go to some large city and have an X-ray taken of the parts to fully determine the cause of your bladder trouble and pain in left side.

MISS A. S., Water Lily, N. C.—Eat no sweets, drink plenty of water, and live mostly on non-fat producing food, such as green vegetables, spinach, lettuce, celery, etc.

MISS K. M. W., Robelin, La.—Use lotio alba to the face, after steaming the face. Apply at night.

MRS. J., Brooklyn, N. Y.—Try Aromatic Cascara Sagrada Mixture for the constipation mentioned. Take a teaspoonful or two at night.

MRS. H. L., Centerburg, Ohio.—Most cases of goiter need operation, and an operation is the only sure cure. Ovarian extract can be gotten at the local drug store, or the druggist can get it from some wholesale house for you. It should be taken under direction of a physician. We never send out any medicine.

MRS. W. A. J., Terre Haute, Ind.—You may have an ulcer at the distal end of the stomach. Bland foods are indicated, and five-grain tablets of soda bicarbonate, taken after food, is the proper remedy to try out.

MRS. M. H., Prestonsburg, Ky.—The condition known as leucoderma, is due to loss of pigmentation, and is incurable. You might try some 1-60 gr. tablets of strychnia sulphate, after meals.

MRS. R. G. V., Hillsville, Va.—You probably have a chronic appendicitis. Be examined by your local doctor and if possible get at the exact cause of the pain mentioned. The other trouble is simply physiological and you should forget it.

MRS. F. B., Biltmore, N. C.—You probably have gas in the intestines which gives you the sensation of heart trouble. Keep the bowels regular, eat food easily digested, drink plenty of water, and exercise moderately. In this way you will no doubt get rid of the pressure over the heart and be benefited, if not cured.

MRS. J. F. G., Mt. Pleasant, Tenn.—You are suffering with extreme nervousness and introspection. Take five-grain assafœtida pills three times a day after meals and note the result.

MRS. L. B. M., Youngsville, Pa.—Just take 1-60 gr. dose of strychnia sulphate after meals for the nervousness, and do not apply anything to the hair in the shape of a hair restorer at all.

MRS. R. M. T., Somerville, Ala.—You probably have chronic pleurisy, which may lead up to some serious lung trouble. Better take a tablespoonful of an emulsion of cod-liver oil after meals, eat all the food that will agree with you and get out in the open all you can. If there is water between the pleura, better have a fly blister applied by your local doctor.

MRS. M. B., Parkdale, Ark.—Hoarseness is only a symptom and there is no remedy for the condition that can be depended on to cure this condition. You can apply to the throat at night a mustard plaster, until the skin is real red. This will help you, but you should have the throat examined by some good throat doctor to ascertain the exact condition of tonsils and retro-pharynx.

MRS. R. E. M., Washington, Pa.—The tear duct will never be entirely well without a radical operation. Having the adenoids removed, and tonsil as well, was the right thing to do; but if the tear duct does not get well, and still fills with pus at times, the sooner the radical operation is done the sooner will the condition be permanently cured.

MRS. F. C., Marked Tree, Ark.—Aromatic Cascara Sagrada Compound will keep the bowels regular. Take a teaspoonful at night, or more as required. Drink plenty of water daily, eat no sweets, avoid pastry, etc., and your complexion will be helped and bowels regulated as well.

MRS. M. S. H., Tyrone, Pa.—Keep your bowels open, eat little of red meats, avoid sweets, drink plenty of water, exercise, and your circulation, redness of face, etc., will take care of itself.

MRS. M. B. E., Deskim, Va.—Take a compound cathartic pill at bedtime, drink plenty of water, and after meals, for the gas, try five-grain tablets of bicarbonate of soda.

MRS. M. R., Wabash, Ind.—Simply a run-down condition following the influenza. Take some good tonic, such as Basham's mixture, in tablespoonful doses after meals, well diluted.

MRS. M. C. P., West Tulsa, Okla.—The only way to remove the hairs without a scar is, as so often suggested in COMFORT, by using or having used the electric needle, in competent hands.

MISS A. J. L., Reliance, S. Dak.—Tetly's Ceylon Tea can be gotten in any large city. Have your local grocer get it for you.

MISS V. G., Denton, Texas.—Have the "blackheads" removed by the comedo extractor, and apply to the face, after steaming the skin, the old lotio alba. You should keep the bowels open, eat no sweets and also avoid pastry of all kinds.

MRS. M. G., Pelham, Tenn.—Take some compound Cascara Sagrada mixture at night for the constipation, drink plenty of good spring water, also take with your meals a teaspoonful of American Oil. For the malaria, take a tablespoonful of Warburg's mixture after meals.

When your wooden shoes are worn out they will go to the pulp mills and come back to you in the form of "leather" shoes. Nothing is lost in the world. Even the pro-Germans and pacifists still hang on.

MURRAY, KY.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

To say that we enjoy your page would be putting it mildly. I got two subscriptions and received your story book which was read by all the family with great interest. We live on a farm and I am very busy helping father and mother with the farm and garden and poultry. Am in the sixth grade and am enjoying my schooldays fine. Uncle, what do you like for pets? I have nine small lambs and a tiny cat. I feel sure you are greatly relieved since the war ended. You certainly did your part with the pen. How would you like to meet Kaiser Bill? I'm sure you would not be long in getting the best of him. Am only four feet four inches tall and am ten years old. With best wishes to you, Maria and Billy the Goat,

Your little friend, RUFUS MASON PARKS.

Rufus, yours is a delightful letter and if you wrote it without Mamma's assistance, you are the wonder of the age. You ask me what kind of pets I prefer. Why chickens, of course—blondes or brunettes are equally appealing. I don't, however, care for the drug-store breed of chicken, who bleach their hair and make their faces resemble the hideous mug of an Indian on the warpath. You ask me how I would like to meet Kaiser Bill. Thousands of ferocious Huns have frequently interrogated me thus: "Vot do you know aboudt der Kaiser?" It will be news to them to know that when the present ex-Kaiser's noble father was alive (please note I always refer to the Kaiser's father in terms of sincere affection) that I not only met his son, then the Crown Prince, but I have been near enough to him to knock his block off, and my one regret is that I did not do it, for even then I had sized him up as a trouble maker. I had a lady in my house for three months who had the royal blood of Germany in her veins and had spent much of her time at the Kaiser's court and knew all the scandals of the Hohenzollern menage. The very dearest friend I have (a man of international fame) went to school with the Kaiser and taught him and also his brother, Prince Henry, how to dress up and play "Injuns." This gentleman, who for years was the Kaiser's bosom chum, also had access to all the archives of the Hohenzollern dynasty and wrote "The Prussian Struggle for Liberty"—something it never got, by the way. This work has no connection with the present war, which was a struggle on the part of the Prussian for world domination. I could tell you lots more of interest on this subject—things that would make Chicago, "The sixth German city in the world," as its mayor lovingly called it, and also Milwaukee—have fits. I hope you will be good to your little lambs and tiny cats, for, as a rule, pets get horribly mauled and abused by children. When you grow up, however, you will take little interest in lambs and you will want a chicken for a pet. When that day arrives, Rufus, be careful in your selection, and if you can't get one that hasn't its face all daubed over with paint, scrub the paint off and see that it wears at least one-hundreth part of the clothing that your sensible mother does. Then you will be able to take your pet chicken out in public without feeling ashamed of yourself.

Mrs. Bettie Witt, Shuff, Va. Widow, with two small children. Has tuberculosis. Needs food, clothes and medicine. Send this poor, sick woman some worth-while cheer. Isaac Price, Lenoir, R. R. 2, Box 26, N. C. Confined to bed from rheumatism for 48 years. Wife also an invalid. Send them a dime shower. Mrs. Rosetta Craig, Stuart, R. R. 5, Va. Invalid. Has rheumatism and kidney trouble. Needs money for food and medicine. Who will help her? Mrs. Laura A. Sandborn, Sebago Lake, Maine. Invalid for over ten years. Confined to bed. Would appreciate quilt pieces, writing material and any assistance you care to send her. Brave and worthy soul. Well recommended. Ruth Paine, Tomahawk, Ky. Blind girl. Poor and needy. Father dead. Send her some cheer. Adda M. Price, Price, N. C. Invalid. Would appreciate second-hand clothing and financial assistance. Mr. J. A. Mills, Wampee, R. R. 1, S. C. Helpless invalid. Has tuberculosis of spine. Father dead, aged mother his only support. Send him some of the sympathy that buys bread. Mrs. K. E. Cross, Trinidad, 724 Stonewall Ave., Colo. Shut-in for six years, due to a fall which injured her spine. One hand almost useless. Alone among strangers and dependent on charity. Would like to return to her old home in Lewiston, Maine, but has no means. Who will help her?

A quarter or a dollar sent to any of these poor souls is laying up, for those who send it, treasure in heaven where neither moth nor rust corrupt, nor thieves break through and steal. If all who read this would cut out their cigarettes and ice cream money for one day and send it to the poor souls listed above, it would make them independent for life.

Lovingly yours,

Uncle Charlie

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs fifty-five cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The fifty-five cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C.," a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, so after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

How to become a Member

Send fifty-five cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

Uncle Charlie's Poems Are a Scream From Start to Finish!

If you are sick and out of sorts, if you have business cares and worries, if everything that should go right is going wrong, if life seems just a bore and existence a nuisance, there is just one thing that will put you in harmony with the joys of life and prove melancholy and misery impostors, and that is a 160-page, cloth-bound copy of Uncle Charlie's Poems. This superb book of fun contains the best recitations ever gotten together, also a sketch of the author's life and some splendid pictures of Uncle Charlie and his faithful Maria preparing his monthly talks for COMFORT. This volume can be obtained free for a club of only three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each. Work for it today!

"Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

Through the columns of this department free information pertaining to Etiquette, Personal Appearance and kindred subjects will be given in answer to questions by our subscribers, but not more than two questions the same month by any one subscriber. Address Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and give your own full name and address. Name will not be published.

TROUBLED GIRLIE, North Carolina.—When a boy is "one's fellow," we are sure it should not be necessary to ask him to call again when he is leaving. If he is a "fellow" worth having, he will not make his attentions dependent upon formal invitation. (2) Do not say "Thank you," when someone says, "I am glad to meet you." When anyone is introduced to you it is sufficient if you say, "How do you do," and offer your hand with a bow and a smile. Do not worry about your bashfulness. This is apt to be a natural and prevalent complaint at fifteen, and is best prescribed for by old Dr. Time and Prof. Experience. You are probably the only one who objects to your blushes, which are most often considered attractive and becoming in a young girl.

L. W., New Mexico.—There is a wide difference between hair which is naturally curly and that which is made to curl by the hand of the owner. We do not advise you to use any preparation on your hair in an endeavor to gain the curly hair which you admire—the result is often far from satisfactory. If you insist upon making your wavy hair into more curly locks, it would be better to use some of the wire or kid "curlers" which can be purchased. Do not use an iron on your hair.

SECRETLY IN LOVE, Illinois.—It would be permissible, under the circumstances, for you to write a few friendly lines to this bashful young man, suggesting that he call to see you when he is again in your vicinity. We think, however, that it would be better if you could wait and say this to him on some occasion when you meet at your aunt's home or at some entertainment. (2) Most certainly you need not refrain from receiving other attentions while waiting till this bashful young man is less bashful.

E. B., Albermarle, N. C.—If this boy has "earnestly begged pardon," we think you should accept his apology. You should remember that he must have had some provocation for his offense—if all that you tell of yourself in your letter is accurately said. (2) Of course you must not think of marriage at sixteen, and we are greatly surprised that your mother is ready to "let you do as you like" in the matter.

M. E. S., Virginia.—It should be a simple thing for you to tell this boy plainly that he must not kiss you, and that you will have to dispense with his friendship if he insists on taking such liberties. (2) You need not fret about letting a boy "know you love him" until he asks you if you do. And then be sure your mind is made up before you answer.

D. J., Dublin, Va.—So-called "depilatories," which may be used to remove light growths of superfluous hair, may be purchased at any good drug store. (2) An introduction between boy and girl cousins of your own might be made as simply as this: "Betty, this is our cousin, Jack Smith." A man is always introduced to a lady, and in presenting your cousin to one of your friends you would say: "Miss Blank, I want to introduce my cousin, Mr. Smith." When an introduction takes place between two men, it is customary to name first the elder of the two.

W. B., Ritchey, Mo.—Sixteen is too young to begin "keeping company," but it is not too old to continue your education, and we are disapprovingly surprised to know that your parents will not allow your attendance at high school. (2) If you do not wish to accept this boy's courtesy tell him you are sorry that you have already accepted someone else as escort.

M. S., Bellingham, Wash.—When a boy blushes it is from embarrassingly centering his thoughts upon himself, his appearance and his actions, and what other people may be thinking of all these. The remedy is to try and be your simple, natural self and strive to interest yourself so much in other persons and their conversation that you will forget yourself and your awkward self-consciousness. It will help you to remember that people you meet are generally not forming careful and watchful opinions of you and your deportment and are quite likely pleased and attracted by the youthful and ingenuous blushes which age will too rapidly cure for you—if our instructions fail.

E. B., Phillips, Wis.—Exercise and diet are the rather difficult but simple roads which lead to weight reduction. Cut out all starchy foods from your meals and abjure sweets—including ice cream and sodas. Let your food consist principally of lean meats, green vegetables, toast and skim-milk. Eat liberally of acid fruits between meals and use such fruits fresh or stewed for desserts at meals where milk has formed no part of the repast. Take long walks; spend as much time as possible at tennis and other active sports, and learn to be a good fresh water swimmer. If you follow such a course as we have mapped out, you are certain to lose weight. But you must persist and be strict with yourself if you would succeed in gaining the sort of figure you wish.

SILLY BILLY, Appleton, Wis.—When anyone is introduced to you, offer your hand with a bow and a smile—and as for words, a simple "How do you do" is quite sufficient. Do not say, "I am glad to meet you."

I. B., Louisville, Miss.—A man may, if he wishes, go to a dance alone and seek his partners after he arrives there. (2) It would be correct for a boy to offer to tie a girl's shoe which had become unlaced. (3) It is best that your parents or other relatives be at home when you arrange to have this young man call.

J. L., Piedmont, S. C.—A man of thirty-three might very suitably, so far as age is concerned, marry a girl of twenty. If, despite his attentions, he does not ask you to become his fiancee, you must cease granting him such liberties as kisses and other signs of affection. We cannot tell you whether you "can trust" this suitor or not, but we can remind you that a poet once wrote, "Men are deceivers ever."

PERPLEXED, Far, W. Va.—Your "beau of a year" must not insist upon his right to kiss you unless he has gained this privilege by asking you to become his wife. (2) You must return the costly presents given you by this boy whom you have now "quit."

M. K., East Pittsburg, Pa.—It is kind of you to sympathize with your brother and care to advise him. If he wishes to improve his slight acquaintance with this girl, he may properly ask her, the next time they meet, if he may call to see her at some day and hour which she might fix. The Sunday that he saw this girl on the street, he could have greeted her and asked if he might walk with her in the way which she was going. All this would have been perfectly correct. And, as part of your advice, tell him, "faint heart ne'er won fair lady."

4 Wheel Chairs in June

560 Is COMFORT'S Total to Date

The four June wheel chairs go to Ernest Ledford Daniels, Fonde, Ky., 150; Gladys Marie Junk, Shawnee, Okla., 87; Sarah Prisack, Louisville, Miss., 74; Nora Wright, Cove Creek, N. C., 70. The figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends for them.

Ernest Ledford Daniels, age 27, had scrofula and rickets in infancy which threw his joints out of place so that he has never been able to walk. He can barely crawl about on the floor but never to get outdoors. He expects his wheel chair to prove a great blessing.

Gladys Marie Junk, age 11, had infantile paralysis when about a year old and it left her lower limbs practically useless.

Mrs. Sarah Prisack, age 83, is unable to walk or even stand alone due to a severe injury to her hip caused by a fall nine months ago.

Nora Wright, age 12, has total paralysis of her lower limbs caused by an attack of infantile paralysis suffered when two years old.

These are all sad cases of suffering which these four wheel chairs will help to relieve. There are many more equally deserving and needy applicants on our waiting list who are suffering for a wheel chair. Don't forget to do your bit to help relieve their suffering.

Mrs. Barbara Keeler, R. R. 8, Sevierville, Tenn., makes a pathetic appeal to COMFORT readers for help in obtaining a wheel chair for her daughter Edna, 15 years of age, whose lower limbs are paralyzed. She writes that she is poor and has to work out by the day to support her family of five. Of course she can neither afford the money to buy a chair nor spare the time to solicit subscriptions for one. She asks COMFORT readers to send subscriptions or cash contributions to Comfort's Wheel-Chair Club for a wheel chair for Edna.

The following Roll of Honor is interesting. Your name would look well in our next month's Roll of Honor.

Sincerely yours,

W. H. GANNETT,

Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 150 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 50 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

Little Boy Enjoys His COMFORT Wheel Chair

Akron, Ohio.

Dear Mr. Gannett:

I am writing to tell you that Thomas has received his wheel chair and certainly does enjoy it. I wish to thank you and, through COMFORT, all the kind friends who were so good to help him get it. It will give him great pleasure this summer to get outdoors in it. Later I will have a picture taken of him in his wheel chair and will send it to you to print in COMFORT.

Sincerely,
Mrs. David Williams.

COMFORT'S Roll of Honor

The Roll of Honor comprises the names of those who have sent five or more subscriptions, or a dollar or more in money, to credit of the Wheel-Chair Club during the month previous. Following each name is the number of subscriptions sent.

Ball, 48; Miss Nellie May Daniel, Ky., for Ledford Daniel, 21; Mrs. George L. Mitchell, Ky., for Fannie Mitchell, 21; Miss Rosalie Koelsch, Okla., for Gladys Junk, 20; Mrs. Ella Sherry, Texas, for her little boy, 15; W. C. Vaughan, Ky., for Fannie Mitchell, 15; Mrs. B. G. Reid, Texas, for Rolly Sherry, 13, Mrs. Rena Daugherty, Miss., for Addie Daugherty, 11; Zelma Sanders, Miss., for Mrs. Sarah Prisock, 8; Turner Lois, Missouri, for own, 7; Mrs. Emmit Albertson, Indiana, for General, 7; Mrs. R. W. Jenkins, Okla., for General, 6; Miss Alice Thompson, Va., for Jesse Cockram, 6, Mrs. W. C. Vaughan, Ky., for Fannie Mitchell, 6; Mrs. Mary Sullivan, Texas, for George Sullivan, $1.85 and 10 subs.; Mrs. Clara H. Shubondy, Nebr., for own, 5; Ethel Howard, Ga., for Gladys Allen Howard, 5, Mrs. Joe McKinzie, Miss., for Mrs. Sarah Prisack, 5; Mrs. N. B. Ridge, Ill., for General, 5; Mr. S. R. Tawney, W. Va., for Jesse G. Cockram, $3.00 cash; Mrs. E. B. Gaskill, N. C., for General, $1.00 cash; Mr. Wm. Jacobs, Ill., for Jesse G. Cockram, $1.00 cash.

That Troublesome "Can"

By Myra Kenton Lowden

When Ng Poon Chew, the famous Chinese editor and lecturer of California, had been studying the English language for about a year he felt very proud of his progress, and confident of the mastery of one-syllable English words, he wrote a letter to his teacher.

"I got along nicely," says Chew, "until the very end where I wanted to say, 'May the Lord bless and preserve you'. That is really what I intended to say but knowing only monosyllables, I wrote instead, 'May the Lord bless and can you'. When next my teacher saw me she praised my letter but warned me never again to use 'can' in that respect.

"I did not understand. I looked in my Chinese-English dictionary for 'can'—to 'preserve'. When I looked for 'preserve' it gave as a synonym 'can'. Then I sought the Webster; 'can'—to 'preserve'; 'preserve'—to 'can'. And there you are! One is wrong the other right, and they mean the same!"

Of course now Ng Poon Chew sees the joke quite as we do and laughed with me. But he explained deftly how difficult the English language is to learn, especially to a Chinese.

"I have been learning your tongue now for thirteen years, and still I make many, many mistakes. But my four children," and his eyes sparkled, "ah, they speak English quite as you do, and Chinese as well as I, and Spanish as well as a Spaniard. They also can read and write German and French."

"Chinese writing is read just backwards isn't it?" I suggested.

The little jovial man showed his perfect teeth in a huge grin, "No, no, no." he laughed." You Americans read backwards. We read right. See?"

It does depend a lot on which side of the earth you were born, doesn't it?

"What is the hardest thing a foreigner has to learn about our language?" I inquired.

"Well, in China we have no number, no case, no person, no gender, no tense, no moods, and no pronouns. It is all very simple—the easiest language in the world to learn to speak. For instance, we say.

"'He go yesterday, to town and buy three horse.' The word he, she, it, they, her, his, etc. are the same word. The context tells the gender. The word 'yesterday' tells the time; 'three' indicates the number of horse. None of our words have different endings or forms. To learn each ending and the plurals and all that is the hardest thing I had to learn."

But Mr. Ng did not speak so well of the simplicity of Chinese characters. "There are ten thousand words in the Chinese language, and each word has its character. We have no alphabet. Each word has its own character and has to be made accordingly."

Ng Poon Chew, Litt. D. is the editor of the first Chinese daily published in America, called the "Chung Sai Yat Po." He lives in San Francisco, California, but every five years makes a visit to his native land. His family were of the ancient royalty and he has not for a moment forgotten the welfare of his race.

Ng Poon Chew admires the missionaries, who he says started China on her moral activity, an American audience, children, dogs, a joke, and Theodore Roosevelt. In fact when the little Chinaman puts on glasses, spreads his lips apart, and says "De-lighted," he is almost an exact likeness of that distinguished cow-boy statesman.

When You Wink

When you read you are constantly winking. But the opening and closing of the eyelid occupies only one-fiftieth of a second, so that you are not aware of any interruption of vision. The average person winks every three seconds, or 1,200 times an hour. From 18,000 to 20,000 winks are a day's work for the eyelids.

The Scholar

The school-girl was sitting with her feet stretched far out into the aisle, and was busily chewing gum, when the teacher espied her.

"Mary!" called the teacher, sharply.

"Yes, ma'am?" questioned the pupil.

"Take that gum out of your mouth and put your feet in!"—Boston Post.

Cubby Bear and the Lie Jackie Told

By Lena B. Ellingwood

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

"I AM going to Betty Badger's place this afternoon, Mamma Bruin," said Cubby Bear. "Dr. Squilly Porcupine has just been here, and asked me to."

"Why?" asked Mamma Bruin.

"Betty Badger's roof has fallen in, and she is sick, so cannot make a new one herself," answered Cubby.

"Do you think you can do it alone?"

"Oh, Dr. Squilly asked Busy Beaver to build it, and I am to help him. Busy Beaver does not know the way to Betty's place—you know he does not often go far from his own home—but I have been there, and can show him where to go."

"I am sorry Betty is sick," said Mamma Bruin. "Tell her I will go to see her soon. Open the door, now, Cubby, and let in the sweet, fresh air!"

Cubby did as he was told, and was looking off down the shady path among the trees, when he gave a cry of surprise and pleasure.

"Mamma Bruin, come!" he called, and trotted off down the path to meet two bears, one large, one small, who were coming toward him. He had known them at a glance; they were Uncle Bear and Jacky Bear, Cubby's little cousin.

Mamma Bruin came hurrying along behind him, glad to welcome the visitors.

"I have brought Jackie to stay with you a few days," said Uncle Bear. "I am going further on, and will call for him on my way back."

"Oh, I am glad!" said Cubby. "But why did not my other cousin, Bonniebelle, come too?"

"Her mother did not want to be left alone," said Uncle Bear. "Now, Jackie, be a good little bear while I am gone, so you will not need to have your ears cuffed."

"We will have such good times!" said Cubby joyfully. "I wish you might stay all the time!"

After dinner, Jackie sat on the door-stone, waiting for Cubby Bear, who was helping Mamma Bruin, to come out to play. "Someone is coming this way," he said to himself, and soon the animal he had been watching stopped in front of him.

"Hullo," said Jackie. "I'm a little Jackie Bear animal. What kind of an animal are you?"

"I am Busy Beaver," was the answer, "and I came for Cubby Bear. He is going away with me this afternoon."

Jackie looked sober. Cubby Bear going away, when he had just come to visit him? Not if Jackie could help it! He glanced around quickly. The door was shut tight.

"No," said Jackie boldly. "Cubby is not going with you. He will stay here, and play with me. I am his cousin, and have come to see him."

"But—are you sure? Did he say so?" asked Busy Beaver doubtfully. "Dr. Squilly Porcupine said he promised to go, and it is not like Cubby Bear to break a promise."

"Yes," said Jackie stoutly, though his heart beat quickly, and he did not look Busy Beaver in the face. "Yes, he said so, and told me to tell you. So you might as well go away."

"That is too bad," said Busy Beaver, "but if he will not go, I cannot, for I do not know the way." And, turning, he started back toward his own home.

"There, I am glad he has gone," thought Jackie, "and glad Cubby did not see him.

Soon the door was opened, and Cubby Bear came out.

"Now I am ready to play," he said. "Have you seen anyone while you were sitting out here?"

"N-ono," Jackie mumbled, wondering why, when one lie had been told, others had to follow if the first were to be kept from being found out.

They played "higgledy, piggledy," and laughed a great deal, but Jackie had a guilty feeling in his heart, and Cubby kept watching for Busy Beaver.

"It is strange he does not come," said Cubby. "Are you sure, Jackie, that no one came by?"

"Nobody," answered Jackie hastily.

"Oh, well, it is early yet," said Cubby. "He will come later, of course."

Then, as the afternoon hours passed, he thought, "Perhaps he could not come today, and will be here tomorrow morning."

"Let's build a camp," said Jackie. "I know how. My papa showed me, and I will show you."

They looked around until they found two small trees which stood not far apart.

"These are just right," said Jackie. "See, their lower branches meet, and are high enough for us to go under. We will tie them together, so they will hold firmly. That is for our ridgepole, and one tree will be at the front and the other at the back of our camp. Then we must gather a lot of long boughs and sticks for the sides, and have the sides sloping so they will come together at the top, and can be fastened to the ridgepole. Do you see what I mean?"

Cubby saw, and the two little bears worked with a will. By supper time they had their tent-shaped camp finished, and called Mamma Bruin out to see it.

"May we sleep out here all night?" asked Jackie.

"Perhaps you may some other night," said Mamma Bruin, "but it is going to rain now. See how dark the sky is! It will be a wet night."

BY SUPPER TIME THEY HAD THEIR TENT-SHAPED CAMP FINISHED AND CALLED MOTHER BEAR OUT TO SEE IT.

Cubby looked up to see the dark clouds, and a big raindrop landed, plump, in his left eye.

"It is raining already," said Jackie, and scampered into the house.

It was, as Mamma Bruin said, a wet night. The rain poured down steadily all the evening.

"My, such a rain! I am glad we are not out in our camp," said Jackie, "we would be cold and wet."

The two little bears went early to bed, and lay listening to the rain as it beat upon the roof, and to the sound of the wind rushing through the tree tops.

"Hark!" said Cubby. "Did I hear someone knocking?"

Mamma Bruin went to the door, and there stood four of Betty Badger's children, wet, shivering, and weeping. Mamma Bruin drew them inside, and closed the door.

"Our roof caved in," they said, all helping to tell the story, a few words at a time. "The big rain came. Our house was flooded. We had to go out. We came, all in the rain, to your house. Mamma Betty knew you would take us in."

"But where is your mamma now?" asked Mamma Bruin.

"She was too sick to come all the way," said the Little Badgers. "She is lying out in the rain, and our oldest brother stayed with her."

"Cubby Bear," said Mamma Bruin, "you must go for Dr. Squilly Porcupine, while I find Betty Badger and bring her here."

The three youngest of the Little Badgers were left with Grandma Bear and Jackie, and the other one went with Mamma Bruin to show her where to find Betty.

Cubby was afraid, going alone in the dark, stormy night to Dr. Squilly's house. He feared he would lose the way, and was glad when he started for home once more, Dr. Squilly with him, even though Squilly scolded angrily.

"Why did not you and Busy Beaver make a new roof for Betty Badger, as you promised?" he demanded.

"Busy Beaver did not come," Cubby told him. "I was waiting for him."

When they reached the house, Mamma Bruin had brought Betty Badger in, and laid her in bed.

"She should not have been in the water," grumbled Squilly. "She was sick enough before."

Cubby and the five Little Badgers slept calmly, but Jackie Bear was wakeful. He had heard enough said to know what trouble had been caused by the lie he had told to Busy Beaver that day, and he was frightened and sorry.

"Poor Betty Badger!" he thought. "Poor everybody! Such a time, and I am to blame for it all, just because I was a selfish little bear, and wanted my cousin to play with me all the time. My papa told me to be good, and I was bad instead. My ears must be cuffed!"

He raised one paw, and gave his ear a sharp rap.

"Ow!" he cried, under his breath. "Now the other one!" So he cuffed the other ear.

Still, even though he had punished himself, he could not sleep.

"Cubby Bear," he whispered, shaking his cousin by the shoulder. "Wake up. I must tell you something."

"What is it?" asked Cubby drowsily.

Then Jackie told about Busy Beaver's coming, and the lie he had told to send him away.

"But you will not tell the others, will you?" he pleaded.

"How can I help telling?" asked Cubby Bear. "You would not want Busy Beaver to be blamed for breaking his promise, when he did not break it at all, would you?"

All through the long night Mamma Bruin and Dr. Squilly Porcupine were up, taking care of poor Betty, who was very sick indeed.

Morning dawned, calm and clear, and the sun came up over the top of the big mountain, shining as though nothing unpleasant ever happened.

"Betty Badger is much better," said Dr. Squilly. "She will soon be all right, I hope, but I shall see Busy Beaver, and tell him he is to blame for all this trouble."

"No," said Cubby. "Do not blame Busy Beaver. He came, and my little cousin told him a wrong story, and sent him away. But please do not scold Jackie. He told me all about it, and he is sorry."

Busy Beaver came again during the forenoon, to see if Cubby Bear would go with him to make the new roof.

"The five Little Badgers and Jackie can all go with us," said Cubby, "and we will have a good time together."

The Little Badgers were pleased to go, but Jackie hid behind Cubby Bear's bed, and would not come out while Busy Beaver stayed.

"No, no," he whispered to Cubby Bear, "I cannot see him. You must go without me."

So, after the others had gone, Jackie Bear sat by himself on the door-stone, and watched the clear blue sky, and the forest, so fresh and clean after the rain.

"I might have gone with them yesterday to fix Betty Badger's roof," he thought, "and we could all have had such a good time! Now, I shall have a lonely day, with no one to play with me. I have made much, much trouble, and there was no need of it at all! I shall never, never, never tell another lie!"

THOUGHTS THAT BREATHE AND WORDS THAT BURN

Half a Billion Pounds of Shoddy in Cloth Sold as Woolen Last Year Proves Need of an Honest Cloth Law

THE beneficent effect of those State and National laws which prohibit fraudulent adulteration and misbranding of food, drugs, commercial fertilizers and cattle feed is so generally recognized that there is a growing demand for an extension of this class of legislation in order to protect the public from fraud in the manufacture and sale of other lines of merchandise—notably in textile fabrics and clothing. Cloth manufacturers have attained such a high degree of proficiency in the art of deceptive imitation through the "weighting" of silks, the treating of inferior fiber so as to resemble silk or linen, the adulteration of fine fabrics by incorporating an admixture of inferior material, and by the substitution of shoddy to a large extent in the manufacture of woolens, that it requires expert knowledge to distinguish the adulterated or imitation goods from the genuine or Simon pure article.

There is no reasonable objection to the manufacture and sale of imitations in food or clothing provided the purchaser is not cheated or otherwise imposed on by the deceptive appearance. In other words it is perfectly legitimate if in every instance the purchaser is warned that the food or fabric, as the case may be, is an imitation product and he is fully informed of its composition and nature. The "Pure Food Law" proceeds on this principle which is well illustrated by its application to butter. Thus an article sold as butter must be made from cow's milk or cream by the process of churning and contain no admixture other than salt and harmless coloring matter; imitation butter may be sold (under license), but it must be sold as such and so labeled that the purchaser will know just what he is buying.

In regard to imitation or adulterated textile fabrics the trouble is that, there being no law to regulate their manufacture and sale, they are largely sold under such misleading names and labels that the public is deceived as to the nature, quality and value of the goods. Some years ago there sprang up a movement for an "honest cloth law," similar to the "Pure Food Law," to prevent deceptive practices in the manufacture and sale of cloth and clothing by requiring imitation or adulterated cloths and the garments into which they are made up for sale to be distinctly labeled so to indicate clearly to the purchaser the true nature and quality of the goods. A bill to accomplish this purpose is now pending in Congress as unfinished business left over from the recent session that closed in June. This bill should be passed at the coming December session of Congress so to become law at an early date, as there is pressing need of it, not only for the protection of the public but also for the preservation of the sheep industry in the United States.

As already intimated, the interests of American sheep raisers are vitally concerned in this bill, and the National Sheep and Wool Bureau of America has just issued a bulletin giving some surprising figures as to the enormous extent to which goods and garments sold as "all wool" are adulterated with shoddy. The bulletin explains that shoddy is made of woolen rags, picked apart and re-spun. In that sense it is second-hand wool, and on this ground the cloth and clothing manufacturers base their claim to sell cloth adulterated with shoddy as "all wool," which is understood by the public to mean new wool, or as the bulletin expresses it, "virgin wool." Like any worn, second-hand, worked-over material, shoddy is poor stuff compared with new wool. Aside from the injurious effect of previous wear the process of picking the rags apart breaks and injures the wool fiber so that shoddy is usually spun and woven with a small percentage of new wool to stick the broken fibers together.

During the war wool was scarce and high because so much of it was required to clothe the army, and there was some excuse for using shoddy to make up the deficiency. Since the war ended (November 11, 1918) there has been an abundance of wool and the price has dropped, but woolen cloth has risen in price and the amount of shoddy used has increased as the result of outrageous profiteering by cloth and clothing manufacturers and dealers. It is notorious that present-day woolens give but little service compared with those bought at a lower price two or three years ago—shoddy is the explanation. In this connection the statistics published by the National Sheep and Wool Bureau are illuminating and exasperating to those who have been paying exorbitant prices for shoddy clothing the past year. The bulletin says:

"Last year, as never before, the shoddy interests succeeded in foisting their goods on the public. * * * Half a billion pounds of shoddy were thrown on the American clothing market in 1919, while a billion pounds of unmanufactured, virgin wool was accumulating in the storehouses. Only 600,000,000 pounds of wool in its natural state, or 300,000,000 pounds of cleaned wool, were converted into cloth. Most of this amount was mixed with shoddy to make it stick together." Through the lack of a law to compel the truthful labeling of cloth "shoddies were sold as 'all wool' and the public, accepting 'all wool' to mean virgin wool, was denied the right of choice and the benefit of a range of prices."

The bulletin complains that "today, the stores are filled with shoddy clothing and a billion pounds of virgin wool fill the storehouses. * * * The shoddy manufacturers have simply thrown themselves between the public with its demand for virgin wool and the sheep men with their supply." They have been able to do this because there is no law to prevent shoddy from masquerading as "new wool" under the popular term "all wool." It is pointed out that, while the public is thus being deceived and imposed on, the wool growers are thereby being forced into insolvency. The French-Capper Truth in Fabric bill, now pending in Congress, is designed to remedy this injustice by compelling manufacturers to stamp or label their cloth with a statement of the percentages of virgin wool and of shoddy it contains. Probably this bill will pass if the people get after their Senators and Congressmen and brad them up about it.

Beware of Saccharin—Don't Use It as a Substitute for Sugar

THE U. S. Department of Agriculture, which is charged with the enforcement of the "Pure Food Law," in a recently issued bulletin denounces the effort that is being made to create a market for saccharin by offering this substance for sale as a substitute for sugar, and warns the public not to use it in food. Saccharin is a chemical derivative of coal tar. It is not a food and has no food value whatever, but because of its intensely sweet taste, being three hundred times sweeter than the best granulated sugar, some American manufacturers have at times used it deceptively in place of sugar for sweetening food products and drinks. In Europe it is still used to a considerable extent for this purpose, but through the enforcement of our Federal and State "Pure Food Laws" the use of saccharin in commercial food products has been practically stopped in this country. Now the saccharin manufacturers are taking advantage of the emergency due to the shortage and high price of sugar to induce American housewives to resort to saccharin as a substitute for sugar. The following extracts are quoted from the bulletin:

"The Department of Agriculture has received a number of inquiries from housewives in the last few days concerning the properties of saccharin, and in every case it has answered by condemning the use of the drug for cooking purposes. It calls attention to the fact that the Bureau of Chemistry is now aiding in the prosecution of a large St. Louis concern which makes saccharin for violation of the Food and Drugs Act. * * * The Department regards the use of saccharin in food as a menace to health. * * * This is the position of the Department today as it was in 1911, when official decisions were rendered. * * * The Department regards food to which saccharin has been added as adulterated, since a substance has been added to the food which may render it deleterious to health. It also regards it as adulterated in that a substance of no food value whatever has been substituted for sugar, a very valuable food. The Department now has pending a criminal prosecution against one concern for the shipment interstate of a parcel of saccharin labeled as harmless. Furthermore, a majority of the States prohibit the use of saccharin in food, either by statute or by regulation."

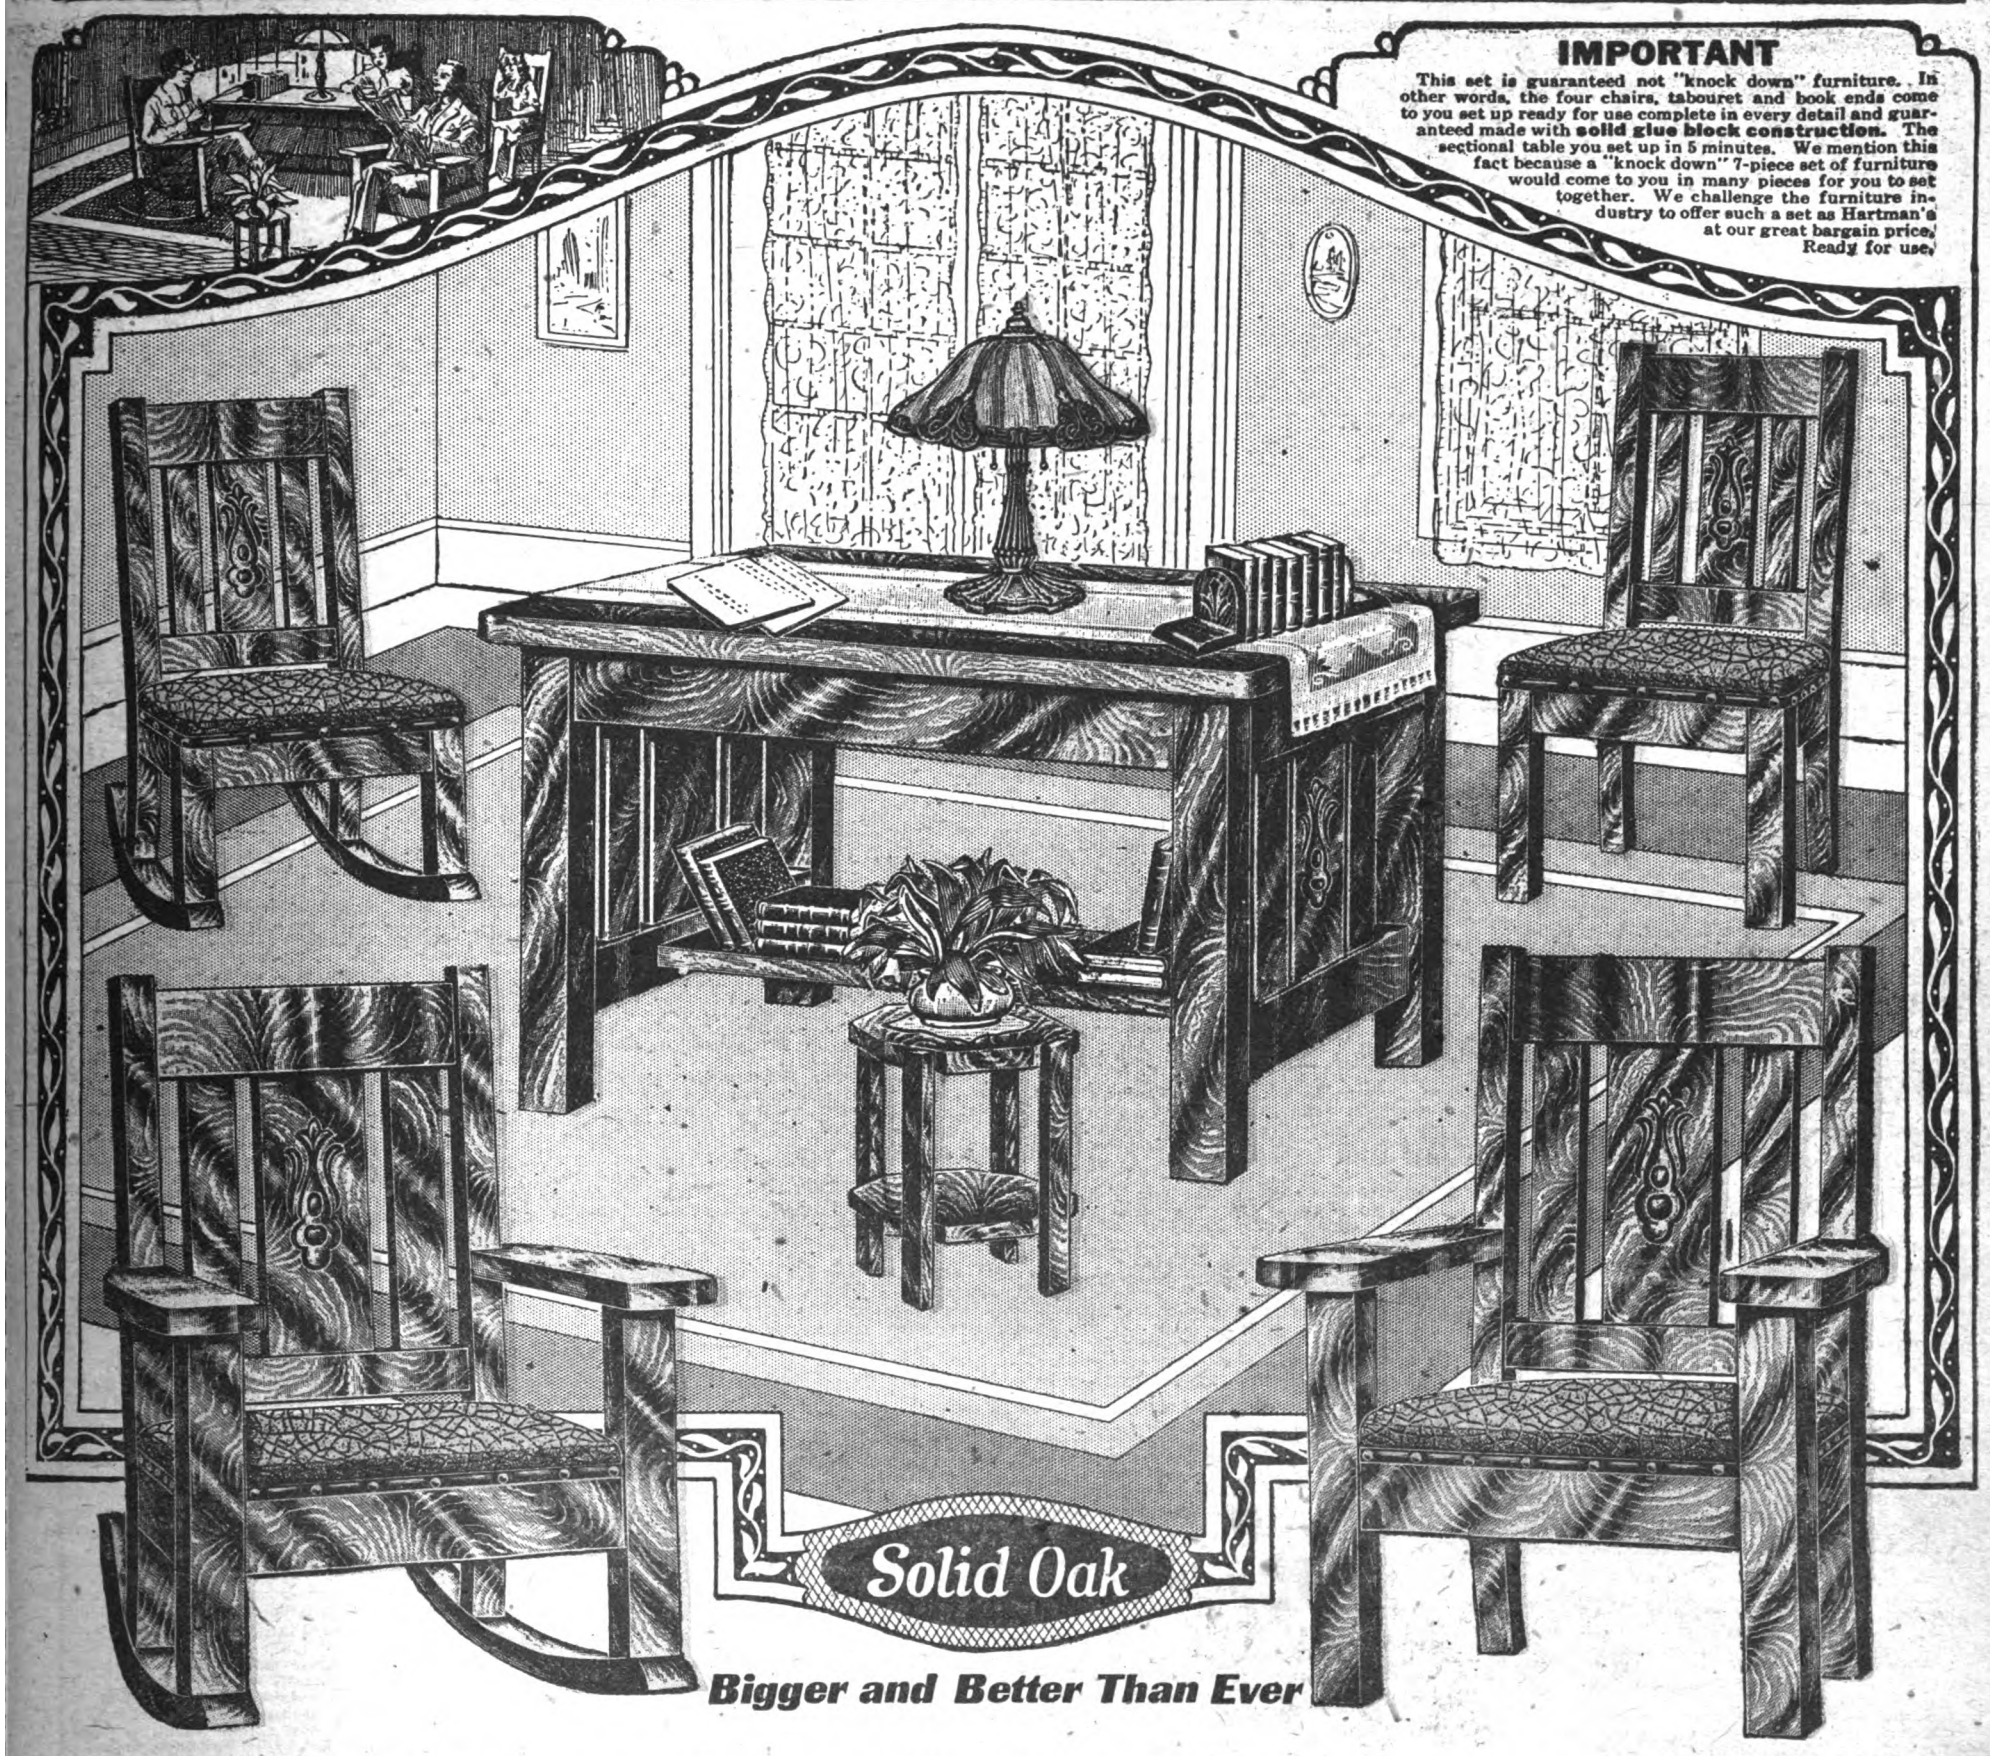
Sensible Ruling on Home-Made Cider and Fruit Juices

IT has been pointed out that a strict application of the National Prohibition Enforcement Act to home-made cider and other fruit juices would work a needless hardship. The law prohibits not only the sale, but even the making or having possession of any beverage containing more than one half of one per cent. of alcohol, except under bond and permit for certain specified purposes. As new cider, grape juice and many other fruit and berry juices may in a few hours, by the natural process of fermentation, generate more than one half of one per cent. of alcohol, and as such a small alcoholic content is not distinguishable to taste or smell, and not perceptible in its effect, the making of fruit or berry juice for home consumption would be a risky undertaking under a strict interpretation of the law. But the situation has been cleared of doubt and embarrassment by a sensible and liberal ruling by John F. Cramer, the Federal Prohibition Commissioner, at Washington, who has charge of the enforcement of the National prohibitory law.

Commissioner Cramer has instructed his subordinates to the effect that the interpretation of the act by the Bureau of Internal Revenue is that any person may, without permit, and without giving bond, manufacture non-intoxicating cider and fruit juices, and in so doing he may take his apples or fruits to a custom mill and have them made into cider and fruit juices. After such non-intoxicating cider and fruit juices are made, they must be used exclusively in the home, and when so used the phrase "non-intoxicating" means non-intoxicating in fact and not necessarily less than one half of one per cent. of alcohol.

Also, that if the person making such cider and fruit juices desires to do so, he may sell such cider and fruit juices at any time to persons having permits to make vinegar. If he preserves such cider and fruit juices at the time they are made [so as to prevent fermentation], he may sell the same to the public in general. Or he may sell the cider and other fruit juices so long as they contain less than one half of one per cent. of alcohol, but the purchasers thereof cannot use or possess the same after they contain more than one half of one per cent of alcohol.

And further, that the cider in the home may be allowed to turn to vinegar if the owner desires, provided he adds no sugar or other fermentable substance to the cider or fruit juices to increase the alcoholic content thereof, inasmuch as such practice is held to constitute a mash fit for distillation, and he may sell the vinegar to anyone who may desire to purchase it.



These regulations are not intended to cover the commercial use of cider and fruit juices, but merely the use of the same as applied to the home.

Anton from Missouri

by Gertrude Overgaard

"If the pass didn't come, I cant go."

"Gone back to work, have you?"

"Did you do all this?"

"Well, we're engaged!" said Angele. "Why not?"

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

RUTH Henshaw opened the door of her room to let in the cool air. There would be none so invigorating where she was going to spend the summer. The scent of lilacs and hyacinths came in from the thicket and the soft smell of freshly-turned earth from the garden, where her husband, familiarly known as Walt, was planting his cabbages.

At the sound of her opening door, the monotone of voices and the creek of rocking-chairs on the terrace ceased and a moment later Angele Henshaw and Anton Waverly came up the side steps.

As always, Angele's dress was simple and black and her yellow hair severely smooth, but her lips carried a firmer curve, her eyes a surer glance, and her figure a more determined poise. She pulled forward a chair and motioned Anton to one opposite.

"I came to tell you, Ruth—I'm going away."

In spite of her long schooling, Ruth's heart jumped and her lips tightened. Had Walt given up his point?

"I have a chance to go for the summer," Angele hurried on. "You know I've never been."

Ruth's excitement subsided as quickly as it had risen. "No, you haven't," she agreed, colorlessly.

"I've been on the job in winter and summer for seven years," said Angele. "I've made good and I deserve a rest."

"Some folks are on the job seven years and don't make good," remarked Ruth with a scornful glance at Anton as she folded a pique skirt and laid it into her trunk which stood partly packed in the middle of the room.

"Perhaps that's because they need a vacation, too." Angele smiled significantly.

Anton Waverly listened in his big, sober, self-satisfied way. He faced Ruth and drawled, "Will you be staying home, seeing Angele's going away?"

"Why should I? Angele's going or coming is nothing to me." Ruth was furious that this procrastinator, this sponger upon Angele's time and affections should counter her thrust by voicing his suspicions.

"Thought maybe it might be to Walt."

"Anton!" reproached Angele. "You go back to your rocker. I want to speak to Ruth."

Ruth gave Anton a parting stab. What difference is that to you?"

"Don't suppose it's any." Anton lounged through the door. "I was just speculating."

"Don't mind him," Ruth. Angele closed the door and came back to the trunk. "It's really because of Anton that I'm going." She lowered her voice. "I want him to see how it is without me."

Ruth dropped the waist she was folding. "Do you mean you want to show him you aren't going to sit and wait any longer for him to propose?"

"Something like that." Angele blushed and her eyes darkened. "I believe after I've been away a while he'll want me."

"I suppose you can try it," said Ruth. "Other folks have. But if Anton Waverly had been the marrying kind he'd have asked you seven years ago."

"Anton is afraid," said Angele. "He wants to be sure he is right before he goes ahead. He needs jogging."

"I'd like to jog him out of that rocking-chair he's sat in for seven years—I'll tell him so when I get a chance."

Angele laughed uncertainly. "That's what I want to do by going away." She backed toward the door.

"Well don't expect too much," Ruth warned. "Remember Anton is not the one to take a hint."

Angele opened the door. "I won't see you again. "I'm going at midnight."

"And I'm going the first thing in the morning." Intently Ruth folded a waist while Angele closed the door behind her.

While she listened to the trundling of trunks through the hall, Ruth wondered whether Angele were going east or west. Her own trip was always to California. And she had grown to hate the place of her yearly pilgrimage.

It was a place of wind; and pushing, perspiring crowds of tourists. The cheap apartment-house to which she returned rather than seek another at the same price, smelled of insect-powder. She hated equally the train-sickness of the journey and the discomfort after her arrival.

But she had no thought of change. Walt's position with the railroad afforded only that pass each year and she had grown into the habit of going as she had grown into the habit of staying in her room when at home. Both had, at first, been peace measures. Was it a trick of time that, as habits, they seemed to put her in the wrong?

Ruth lay awake long after the departing whistle of Angele's train was lost in distance. But early the next morning she completed her preparations for departure. Everything was done up to the point of dressing, when Walt came. Each year he waited until the very day of her departure before he gave her the pass.

He entered the room without knocking and seated himself in a chair; and he wore his office suit. All these things were contrary to custom. Ruth wondered whether he, too, might be conscious that Angele was away.

"I see that you are getting ready to go." He looked from her to the trunk.

"Yes. You brought the pass?"

"No. I didn't."

Ruth sat back. That was why he had been different. "Didn't the Company send it? Isn't it here on time?"

"It won't be here at all. I'm sorry, since you've counted on it."

"Certainly I've counted on it. Why won't it? What's happened?"

"There's been a lot of anti-pass talk——"

"There's been that before."

"I know there has. But this year I'm not getting one for you. That's all."

She was surprised but secretly she didn't care. "Very well," she pronounced. "If the pass didn't come, I can't go." She took her grey pongee traveling-suit from the back of the chair and replaced it on its hanger.

Walt paused by the door. "And I can't manage it otherwise. The taxes and everything else is higher and my salary remains the same."

Ruth began taking things out of the trunk. She need not explain that she had taken the pass only because it cost him nothing.

He still hesitated. "I'll eat down town. You won't need to be bothered with much of anybody around—Angele's gone away for the summer."

He waited for her comment but she made none. He had stood just there six years before when she had first wanted Angele to go away for the summer.

"Are we always to have her with us?" she had asked. "Are we never to be alone?"

And he had answered angrily, "What do you expect me to do? Turn her out? She is my sister, isn't she? And this is her only home."

The wrath with which she had locked her door against him passed but Angele remained and there had been no peace between husband and wife.

"Things may be so you can go next summer," said Walt. "It is hard when you had counted on it."

The wash waists, the cotton wrapper and the pique skirts were piled on the bureau. There was nothing really fit for a trip. And there had never been money enough to travel in comfort. Here she would have the cool, roomy house to herself. Then she would not pretend to herself that Angele's absence made no difference.

"I would rather stay," she finalled, sharply.

Walt's face cleared. "All right. That settles it." With taut shoulders, he marched down the steps.

As he had said, she saw little of him after that day. She cooked her own meals, read and knit socks for the soldiers. She had the house to herself.

The clock was her only companion. In the long afternoons she sat in the living-room where she could see its symmetrical mahogany and arabesque of darker wood. It was her friend. Its chime had reached into her seclusion and had seemed to call her to come back.

The solitude of the empty house cleared her mind. She looked into the past dispassionately and saw that through it all she had never disliked Angele. She had not wanted her only because she had not wanted anyone. And she was glad that Walt had not turned her out.

Against Anton Waverly, however, her resentment persisted. He occupied his chair on the terrace every evening just as he had when Angele was there. From her room Ruth glowered out upon his fringe of sandy hair and the section of neck which creased above his soft collar. The curves of his back offended her.

To avoid the sight of his even rocking she turned her chair from the front window to the one overlooking the garden where Walt was hoeing his corn.

Seen through the shrubs, the blurred outline in tan overalls suggested an overgrown boy. And Walt's task was boyish in its uselessness. Every summer he made a garden and no one used it. His corn was never picked and his tomatoes rotted on the vines. Everything in his garden went to waste.

Ruth dropped her knitting and looked up at a calendar which she had saved for its bright picture of a Belgian baby. Across its brown mat in red letters was the inscription, "Save food. Don't waste it."

Why shouldn't she put up what he raised? It would give her something to do and Walt need not know. If he missed the products of his garden let him think the neighbors had accepted his invitations to help themselves.

The next morning she listened while he descended the stairs and closed the front door quietly behind him. She watched from behind the living-room curtains as he walked briskly down the street. He was still a young man in spite of grey hairs above his ears and a slight settling of the figure. Well, the strain had aged her, too.

As she turned the clock chimed eight. He would not be back until six. The whole day was hers.

The early cherries were ripe and they would be her first care. She found step-ladder and buckets and climbed the tree. The sun shone through the leaves. The June air was quickening. It imparted stirrings of Freedom.

The last time she had been in the cherry tree Walt had helped her, the June before the baby died. If the baby had lived she might have put up with having Angele around. But after that it was too much.

After her lunch she began canning. The fruit, rich with juice, simmered on the stove. The shining jars freshly washed scalded in the pan. She had collected the fruit-funnel, the top-tightener, and the jar-lifter from obscure drawers in the pantry. She proceeded to pour the steaming cherries into the jars.

By three o'clock the first lot was sealed and standing top down on the kitchen table. Another basketful had to be stemmed and seeded and by the time it was ready the afternoon sun was slanting in at the north door. And more jars were to be scalded. To save time, she poured boiling water from the tea-kettle over them and began immediately to fill them with fruit.

A pop warned her of disaster. She jumped just in time to avoid a deluge of steaming juice. The bursted jar emptied its contents over the stove and the floor.

With mop and brush she worked on hands and knees to clear away the mess. A streak of sunlight lay across the space under her hands and was suddenly extinguished. She looked up to see Anton Waverly's head against the screen.

He was observing her with satisfaction, his round blue eyes wide open, his mouth pulled to a half smile. "Gone back to work, have you?"

The screen made little squares of his forehead. He was cool and leisurely and clean.

Ruth sat back on her heels and met his eyes squarely. "I have not."

"Then you're not putting up fruit on Walt's account?"

"I'm putting up fruit on my own account, if you should know."

"Don't know as I should," drawled Anton. "Thought you might have fixed things up with Walt."

Ruth folded her hands. She would not continue while Anton Waverly looked on, neither would she talk to him if she could avoid it.

But instead of going he stepped inside. "I was right sure you had made it up," he confided, "when I smelled cherries cooking—just stopped to sit on the porch till Miss Hancock's supper-bell rings. It's warm for June."

Ruth sprang to her feet. "Why don't you marry Angele and get a porch of your own? You've scared off everybody else and now instead of marrying her yourself you come here and sit and rock and sit and rock and sit and rock! Oh, you—I'd be ashamed!"

Anton used the door as a support against her maledictions but when he spoke his terms were maddeningly even. "That's what I ask myself:—Why don't I? But I've about come to the conclusion that there's too much risk. I've never been much of a risking man."

"Risk!" scorned Ruth.

"That's what I said,—risk. When you get into a thing like marriage there's no going back. I guess I'm pretty well off as I am." He walked out of the door, letting it slam after him.

Ruth dropped on her knees and scrubbed furiously at the cherry-stain. She might have been scrubbing Anton Waverly's despised features. He was to blame for everything. If he had married Angele when he should, her own trouble with Walt would never have occurred.

After her encounter with Anton, Ruth carried on her preserving plans. But she was careful to confine it to the morning and early hours of the afternoon. She canned peas, beans and beets, and dried corn. She remembered her mother's method for the corn and how delicious it had been, soaked over night and cooked in milk.

In August she made pickles and relishes and canned the tomatoes. There was a plentiful crop in Walt's garden and the shelves of the fruit-cellar began to groan under their load.

At last it seemed that the little, dark, low-ceilinged room would hold no more. Ruth stood counting the jars one evening after her solitary supper. She had carried down a basketful and they had occupied the last foot of shelving.

Her count mounted toward the two-hundred mark. She moved her candle here and there, her lips moving tensely. "Eighty-nine, ninety,——" A draught from the outside basement door blew out her candle. She sprang to pull shut the low door which she had forgotten to close behind her.

But she was too late. Walt stood in the oval entrance.

"I didn't know you were home!"

"Just came,—you haven't seen the rake about?" He did not look for it, however. Instead, he looked from the loaded shelves to Ruth's face. "Did you do all this?"

Ruth grew red. "I didn't want it to go to waste—on account of the war." She thanked heaven for the phrase. Otherwise, he might infer what Anton had.

Walt's eyes held hers. He caught her shoulders and made her face him. "Ruth, you haven't forgotten! You do care!"

His voice hurt to the heart. She felt herself turn white and knew that this might be the end. But her tongue was locked.

Walt's arms dropped and he kicked into the corners by the door where the rake might have been. In a moment he would be gone and she would be alone again.

She caught his sleeve. "I want my home," she cried. "I want my clock!" She clutched his arm. Tears streamed on her hands.

Walt held her to him. "I've been a fool to keep Angele here," he said. "We'll begin over."

In the days which followed even Anton Waverly's rocking ceased to annoy Ruth. She assumed the duties of the home and their life resumed the order of the first days of their marriage.

Anton early recognized the restored relations of the household with an interested observation to Ruth. "So you've made it up, have you?" Ruth assented good-naturedly and after that his rocking took on a livelier note in her ears. She no longer disliked him.

One evening she asked him to supper and while they were eating with the low light over the table and an appetizing meal which she had prepared lending its cheer, Angele appeared.

She was younger and more exuberant, a new Angele. Her clothes were pink and grey. She flew about the table with the confidence of girlhood. She kissed and embraced Ruth and Walt and then kissed and embraced Anton Waverly.

Walt indignantly remonstrated. "Angele!"

"Well, we're engaged!" said Angele. "Why not?"

Anton pulled her down beside him while he looked across the table to Ruth. "When I saw that you had made up with Walt," he explained, "I telegraphed Angele to come home and get married."

"I'm glad if I helped." Ruth flinched at thought of her wasted years.

"But my absence really did it," declared Angele. "When Walt offered me the pass to California, I simply had to go in order to bring Anton to the point."

"That had nothing to do with it," said Anton, "I had made up my mind."

Ruth puzzled. A pass to California! Her pass! So Walt had had his share in this reconciliation!

"Say you don't mind my doing it," he begged. "I wanted you to stay."

A Bit of Mid-Summer Madness

ONE thing about Silver Promontory was its exclusiveness, therefore, when John Poindexter arrived toward evening, the first thing he did was to dress for dinner. This accomplished, he entered the big dining-room with his easy, unconscious manner. Many eyes were turned upon him for in his dress clothes he was handsome enough for the movies.

The head-waiter gave him a table in the very center of the room bordering upon the fountain on whose tumbling spray colored lights constantly played, and where one heard the music from the string quartette to best advantage.

Poindexter had scarcely seated himself and given his order when he heard himself paged.

"Mr. Poindexter—Mr. Poindexter—Mister Poindexter!"

Annoyance for a moment wrinkled his brow for he disliked to be thus publicly paged—to him it had an air of gaucherie—but he had neglected to request the hotel clerk (as was his custom ordinarily) to hold any calls, telegrams or messages until after he had dined.

He took the telegram which the "buttons" tendered him, and opening it, read:

"OLD DEAR:

"Let this introduce Miss Sylvia Lansdonne, who is staying at Silver Promontory. Look her up and tell her that Millicent wants you to meet her.

"FRANKLIN MONTGOMERY."

"Just because Frank has married the 'dearest girl in the world' is no reason why I should hook up to her dearest friend, and that's what Frank and Millicent seem to wish. They've drummed her up enough. Just for this, though, I shall take particular pains not to meet Miss Lansdonne."

He pushed the telegram back into the envelope and tucked it away inside of his coat and began his dinner.

He had not progressed beyond the fish course, however, when he was attracted by the appearance of a woman of extraordinary beauty, somewhat exotic in type. Very dark-haired, and with a skin of marble hue, she suggested a woman of foreign birth, a Russian, perhaps. She was gowned magnificently in a thing of delicate yellow with gleaming splashes of gold here and there, and when the waiter seated her, it was at a table so close to Poindexter's that he could see her shapely foot in a gold-brocaded slipper and a few inches of stocking which was of extravagant pattern. In her hair she wore a large bird of Paradise, its white purity wonderfully set off against the blue-black background of her hair.

Poindexter as a rule did not note strange girls or women particularly, or, if he did, he weighed them in the same measure—they were either pretty or not pretty—well-dressed or not well-dressed—young or not young. Perhaps, though, this woman attracted for the reason that from the moment she sat down, Poindexter felt her eyeing him. But try as he would, suddenly or covertly, he could not catch her in the act though each time he looked at her he felt certain she had just looked away.

Thus the dinner passed, after which Poindexter rose and went out upon the porch to smoke a cigar. He leaned against one of the huge columns

Address MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, CARE COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

HERE are some more "best jokes" just to prove to the world that the COMFORT Sisters' sense of humor does as good work under the scorching August sun as it did last April when it was drenched with April showers, and it takes a pretty strong sense of humor to withstand sunburn and wet feet.

But lest we are becoming too frivolous, read the letters from mothers who are passing their dearly-bought experience on to you for you to profit by it and be warned in time.—Ed.

Following Copy

They were rehearsing for the opera when the conductor was nearly frightened out of his boots by a terrific blast from the trombone player in the corner.

"What are you doing?" roared the conductor.

"I'm sorry, sir," came the reply. "It was a fly on my music. "But," he added with just a touch of professional pride, "I played him."

Mistaken Identity

An Irishman who wasn't much of a hunter, went out to hunt one day and the first thing he saw to shoot was a blue jay sitting saucily on the top of a fence. He blazed away at the bird and then walked over to pick it up. What he happened to find there was a dead frog which he raised carefully at arm's length, looking at it with a puzzled air. Finally he remarked: "Well, bedad, but ye was a devil of a foine lookin' bird befur Oi blew ther fithers off'n yese."—MARY MILLER, Scranton, Pa.

Persistency Won

Freddy came into the library one day where his father was reading. "Pa," he began, "what is a cat's?"

"I'm busy, don't bother me," was the impatient reply.

There was a few minutes' silence, then—"Pa, what part of the body is the honeymoon? I read in the paper where a man got hurt on his honeymoon."

No response, though Freddy thought the paper his father was reading shook and acted "awful funny."

"Is mamma over at Mrs. Brown's, pa?"

Still silence. His father still read on. Freddy edged toward the door. "Say, pa, bad accident down town today. Nine lives lost."

His father looked up quickly. "How's that?" he asked with interest.

"Street car ran over a cat," and Freddy vanished through the door as his angry parent reached for the razor strop.—SUSIE TRUNEE, Greenbrier, Ark.

DALTON, KY.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I wonder if you will let me join your happy circle? I have been a reader of COMFORT for seven years and the more I read it the better I like it.

Many times I have wanted to write but never had the courage until I read the letter from Wife in Name Only.

Stay with him. He loves you more than he does the nurse for he only thinks he loves her. She has been dressed up every time he has seen her and maybe she has tried to be a little better than she really is when she was with him. I believe that when one loves their love is returned so just be good and after a while he will think to himself, "What a fool I was to think that I loved another when I have a good wife who loves me." Don't say a word to him about her and when he comes to himself he will be ashamed of himself and love you more than ever.

ARNOLD HOWARD BRANDON.

I enjoy the letters from mothers most of all as I am a young mother. I have been married seven years to one of the best of men and I don't believe anybody gets along any better than we do. I love him

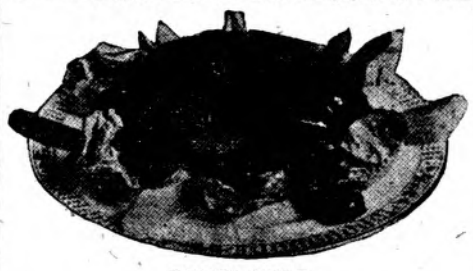
Comfort Sisters' Recipes

NO longer are three meals a day a bugbear to the housewife for "with green things a-growing everywhere we pass," there is variety enough for even the most fastidious, and if the supply of tomatoes, corn, peppers, peas and beans, and all other good things of the garden, only lasted long enough, being a vegetarian would be a positive pleasure. And all these things can be canned so successfully that summer is carried well into the winter so far as its vegetables and fruits are concerned.—Ed.



RICE WITH TOMATOES AND CHEESE.—Wash one cup of rice, add slowly to four and one half cups of boiling water, salted, and cook twenty-five or thirty minutes, stirring occasionally. When cooked, evaporate the water by leaving it partly covered on a slow fire. Add one half can of tomatoes or equal quantity of fresh, one half cup of grated cheese, one teaspoon salt and one quarter teaspoon pepper and let boil. Serve with grating of cheese over top.

BEAN POLENTA.—Drain and mash four cups of beans, add one quarter teaspoon mustard, a little pepper, one tablespoon molasses and one tablespoon vinegar. Form the mixture into cakes and brown on both sides in hot greased pan.

MEAT LOAF.—One pound chopped meat, two cups bread-crumbs, one cup thick white sauce and salt and pepper to season. Make white sauce by adding milk to flour and stirring to make smooth paste. Boil, stirring until thick and smooth. Form into loaf, put into buttered pan and bake in moderate oven two hours.

POT ROAST WITH VEGETABLES.—Choose a piece of meat with a little bone and fat, to weigh about two pounds. Brown this on all sides in a hot kettle. Add two cups of water and cook slowly three and one half hours, adding more water when necessary. Have ready two cups of carrots, one cup of turnips, one cup of parsnips and two onions, all chopped fine, and add when meat has cooked two and one half hours.

TOMATO JELLY.—Cut six well ripened tomatoes into small pieces without peeling. Add two whole cloves, two whole peppers, and two whole allspice; or, a small pinch of each kind of the ground spice. Also half a small onion chopped fine, and three teaspoons of sugar. Stew until the tomato is well cooked and then put through a fine sieve. To one quart of the strained tomato, add one half box of gelatine, previously soaked in a little cold water and added while the tomato is boiling hot. Set away over night and when ready to serve, turn out on a plate lined with lettuce leaves. This same recipe makes a delicious sauce for omelet, sweetbreads or macaroni by thickening a little with flour and omitting the gelatine. Add butter just before serving.

NEW HUNGARIAN GOULASH.—Peel two medium-sized onions and slice into lard. Let fry a few minutes, then add one and one half pounds hamburg steak, one half cup of cooked rice and two tomatoes or their equivalent in canned tomatoes, cooked with one quarter cup macaroni. Season with salt and pepper and cook slowly one hour.—MRS. IVAH GALLUP, Clayton, Mich.

BROWNED SWEET POTATOES.—Wash medium-sized potatoes and cook in boiling salted water until tender. Drain, cool slightly and peel. Cut in one-third inch slices lengthwise and place in a greased baking pan. Dot with small piece of butter or butter substitute and pour over them one half cup of corn syrup. Bake in hot oven until well browned.

ESCALLOPED POTATOES.—Cut one quart of cold boiled potatoes, or as many as you have, into thin slices, season well with salt and pepper. Put a layer in a buttered baking tin, dredge with flour and dot over with small pieces of butter. Continue this until all the material has been used; then add hot milk until it may be seen through the top layer. Cover with fine bread-crumbs and cook twenty minutes.—MRS. LIZZIE LAWLEY, W. Frankfort, Ill.

STUFFED TOMATOES.—Cut a thin slice from the stem end of large, smooth tomatoes. Spoon out the soft center and remove the seeds, mixing with the pulp an equal amount of highly seasoned cracker-crumbs. Onion juice, a little sugar, and salt and pepper make excellent seasoning. Fill the cavities with the mixture, sprinkle the tops with fine cracker-crumbs moistened with melted butter, and bake in an agate pan until the crumbs are brown. Serve at once. Chopped ham may be used in place of part of the cracker-crumbs if a richer dish is desired.

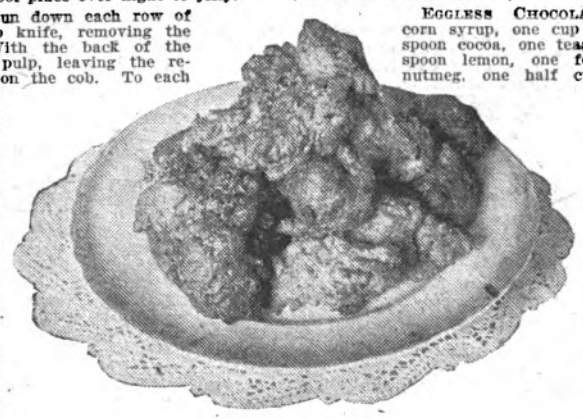
GREEN TOMATOES.—Slice large green tomatoes, sprinkle with salt and small pinch of pepper, cover with corn meal or flour and fry in hot fat until brown.—ANNIE CARTER, Kerns, Ky.

BLACKBERRY JAM.—Mash twice as many blackberries as sugar used and after they are well mashed, cook until thick, stirring constantly.

CANNED BLACKBERRIES.—Use only the best berries, putting them into jar and shaking them down as much as possible without crushing the fruit. Put covers on jars, set on trivet in kettle of cold water and let come to boil. Boil ten minutes. Have ready a syrup made of one cup of sugar to two cups of water. Water may be allowed to cool a little and then jars may be removed from kettle and placed on a folded cloth, away from cold air, and filled nearly full with the syrup which has been heated to the boiling point. Put rubbers on jars and with a silver spoon press carefully around the berries to let out air bubbles, add more syrup to overflowing and seal.

PEACH JAM.—Pick over, wash, peel and slice two and one half pounds of peaches. Add one pound of sugar, one teaspoon allspice, one half inch ginger root, one quarter inch cinnamon bark and half a teaspoon of mace. The spices should be tied together in a cheese-cloth bag. Then add three quarters cup peach juice and cook until mixture is thick and clear. Turn into sterilized jars and seal.



STEAMED SALMON LOAF.—Remove skins and bone from can of salmon and chop finely and rub to paste. Beat three eggs until light, add one half cup of bread-crumbs, four tablespoons of melted butter, one half teaspoon of salt, and a little pepper. Stir this into the salmon, turn into buttered mould and steam one hour. Serve cold with mayonnaise dressing.

MAYONNAISE DRESSING.—Break the yolk of one egg in a bowl, add flour, salt, pepper and mustard to taste. Mix with a fork, then beat well with egg beater. Pour in very gradually from one to two cups of olive oil, beat constantly. Thin out with lemon juice. Whipped cream improves it. All ingredients must be ice cold before using.

SCALLOPED SQUASH.—Boil and mash squash in usual way and let cool. Beat the yolks of two eggs and add to squash when nearly cold with three tablespoons of milk, one tablespoon of butter, salt and pepper to taste. Pour into buttered baking dish, cover with bread-crumbs and bake in quick oven until brown.

JELLIED CHICKEN OR VEAL.—Boil a chicken in as little water as possible, until the meat falls from the bones; chop rather fine, and season with pepper and salt; put in a mould a layer of the chopped meat and then a layer of hard-boiled eggs cut in slices; then layers of meat and eggs alternately until the mould is nearly full; boil down the liquor in the pot one half; while warm, add one quarter of an ounce of gelatine and when dissolved pour into the mould over the meat. Set in a cool place over night to jelly.

CORN OYSTERS.—Run down each row of kernels with a sharp knife, removing the top of the hull. With the back of the knife press out the pulp, leaving the remainder of the hull on the cob. To each cup of pulp add one well-beaten egg, salt and pepper, and flour enough to hold egg and corn together, which should not be more than one heaping tablespoon. Drop in spoonfuls on a hot greased griddle. Canned corn may be used by putting it through the meat chopper and adding three teaspoons of milk and a little more flour. These are delicious cooked in deep fat.

CORN OYSTERS.

BAKED ONIONS.—Wash, but do not peel the onions; boil one hour in boiling water, slightly salt, changing the water twice in the time; when tender, drain on a cloth, and roll in buttered tissue paper, twisted at the top, and bake an hour in a slow oven. Peel and brown them; serve with melted butter.

SARDINE SALAD.—Remove skin and bones from sardines and mix with an equal quantity of the yolks of hard-boiled eggs, mashed. Arrange on lettuce leaves and serve with mayonnaise dressing.

FRIED CHICKEN.—Singe, wash and wipe dry. Cut apart at the joints and remove the breast bones. Roll each piece in crumbs, then in egg and crumbs again, and fry in deep hot fat until brown. The Southern style of frying chicken is in salt, fat pork till brown and tender. Remove chicken, pour boiling water into pan and thicken with flour stirred up with cold water. Season and pour over chicken.

OX EYES.—Cut inch-thick slices of bread into rounds with top of a tumbler, then take smaller circles from center with top of a wine-glass. Lay in a buttered tin and cover with milk. When they have absorbed it, break an egg into the center of each ring and pour a teaspoon of milk on the top of each egg. Bake in a hot oven until the whites are set but not brown. Serve on a hot dish.

EGGLESS CHOCOLATE CAKE.—One cup corn syrup, one cup sour milk, one tablespoon cocoa, one teaspoon vanilla, one teaspoon lemon, one fourth teaspoon grated nutmeg, one half cup vegetable oil, one half teaspoon salt, one teaspoon soda, one and one half cups barley flour, one half cup corn-starch, one half cup mashed potato. Combine the corn syrup, milk and extracts and stir in the vegetable oil. Sift together the cocoa, nutmeg and remaining dry ingredients. Add the mashed potato to the first mixture. Beat well, and then beat in the dry ingredients. Pour into a brick-shaped or tube pan which has been well oiled, sprinkle the top with a little cocoanut and some chopped candied fruit or nuts and bake 45 minutes in a moderate oven.

SQUASH PIE.—After cutting the squash into small pieces boil until tender, drain well and put through a strainer. To every cup of the squash add one of sugar, three eggs, well beaten, two and one half cups of milk, one teaspoon of vanilla and salt to taste. Mix well and pour into pie-shell and bake slowly.

SALMON SALAD.—Flake cold, boiled salmon. Mix with dressing and arrange on nests of lettuce leaves. Garnish with slices of hard-boiled egg.

A Woman's Smile

Should Reveal Glossy Teeth

All statements approved by high dental authorities

It is Film That Clouds Them

That slimy film which you feel on your teeth is the cause of most tooth troubles.

It clings to the teeth, enters crevices and stays. The tooth brush does not end it. The ordinary tooth paste does not dissolve it. So it continues to mar the beauty and to wreck the teeth.

That film is what discolors—not the teeth. It is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

That film is the teeth's great enemy. So dental science has for years sought a way to end it. Now an efficient film combatant has been found. It has been proved by careful tests. And now leading dentists all over America are urging its daily use.

Supplied to All Who Ask

For home use this method is embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And to show its effects a 10-Day Tube is sent to anyone who asks. This is to urge that you get it.

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve it, then to day by day combat it.

This method long seemed impossible. Pepsin must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth. But science has discovered a harmless activating method. And now active pepsin can be daily used to combat this viscous film.

Able authorities have made convincing clinical and laboratory tests. Now everyone is asked to make a home test and see what Pepsodent does.

Compare the results with the methods you are using. See the change in ten days. Then decide for yourself if this new method is best for you and yours. Cut out the coupon now.

An Agent of Providence

by Anne McQueen

"Now for an adventure in making somebody happy!"

"The roof ain't what it might be," apologized Miss Matty

"Could you—will you, Betty darling?"

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Ganhett, Pub., Inc.

BETTY Brandon, muffled in a big dust-coat that hid the ravishing curves of her trim little figure, with a soft hat pulled down to the lobes of her rosy ears and hiding all of the adorable beauty of eyes and dimples and bright hair that it possibly could, stood on the curb beside her new little car, and waited for Bob Lowry to come to take the first ride in it with her.

Up the street came Bob Lowry, big, broad-shouldered, a little stout, a little grey about the temples, a few wrinkles hiding in the corners of his kindly blue eyes; a dependable man and a likable, one would decide at first glance. He was a lawyer, and he had been till today, her twenty-first birthday, the guardian of the person and property of Betty Brandon.

"Many happy returns and a heap of congratulations on your day of freedom, young lady," called the lawyer, as he approached, holding out a big box that plainly told it contained the confections dearest to a girl's heart—candied fruit.

"Oh, Bob—just what I needed!" crowed Betty as she dived into its depths and popped a crystallized cherry into her pink rose of a mouth.

Bob watched her with a queer look in his placid eyes. Betty was still a child, he decided, just a laughing, happy-hearted child, while he was getting to be an old man—twelve full years her senior and feeling much older. No—it would never do in the world—youth must mate with youth—he would keep silent!

He sighed briefly, threw his shoulders back as if to relieve a burden that bore heavily, and resumed, laughingly:

"Well, Bettykins, now that you are a malefactor of great wealth, what will be the first thing you propose doing with your money?"

Make somebody very happy," replied Betty, between bites at a big and juicy pineapple-slice. "Honestly, Bob, I regard myself as just an agent of Providence concerning my money. You'll see how happy I'll make folks with it. Hop in—I'm crazy to try the little car."

Bob having "hopped" in with care, Betty fluttered like a drift of thistledown beside him, took the steering wheel in her small, capable hands and they whirled away out into the country; Betty, with the one eye her hat permitted to show, searching the landscape in eager quest of a case befitting the intervention of an agent of Providence.

"Now for an adventure in making somebody happy! We'll take the first turn-off, and maybe come right on a girl who pines for college, or a farmer who needs the mortgage lifted. Only how on earth are we to find out?" She raised puzzled eyes to his, a little worry-wrinkle creeping between her hidden brows, "I've just got to make somebody happy on my birthday, Bob—I've thought of it so long."

"Trust to me—I'll hunt out one for you," promised Bob, cheerily, and sighed to think how very, very easy it would be to find one—if she only knew how to look at the man beside her!

But he didn't have to keep his rash promise, for before they had been on a rather rough and rooty country road very long a sudden rainstorm came up, driving them into a tumble-down cottage so near the road that in dry weather it must have been constantly covered with the dust from passing vehicles. And here the emissary of Providence found Miss Matty and Miss Molly.

As they ran to shelter the door of the shanty opened with hospitable haste and a voice that thrilled with pleasurable excitement bade them walk right in. "Sister seen you from the window, and she allowed you'd have to run in out o' the rain; folks do, in bad weather, we bein' so nigh."

The speaker was a tall angular woman of late middle age; freckled and wholesome her weather-beaten face shone with a kindly smile as she bustled forward with chairs.

"Put 'em nigher me," bade another voice, "the rain's leakin' in right there. And you fetch a foot-tub, Sister—and set the dish-pan under that corner by the bed."

With alacrity the other obeyed; she set the chairs near the window, where the other speaker—a cripple, judging by the crutches at her side—sat in a comfortable, padded armchair.

"Oh, I hope we aren't putting you to any trouble," deprecated Betty, with a smile that was like a sunbeam, "we thank you so much for letting us in—a regular storm outside."

"Not a mite o' trouble," hastened the cripple, "I'm Miss Molly Brown and Sister's Matty. We're twins, though we don't favor."

"The roof ain't what it might be," apologized Miss Matty as she set the dish-pan and the foot-tub under the leaks, "but laws, it's home, and all we got! We were born right here, Molly and me, goin' on sixty year ago, come June."

"Ain't no call to be tellin' ages," said Miss Molly, tartly, "and I smell the dandelions boilin' over on the stove."

Miss Matty disappeared through an open doorway into a lean-to beyond. Betty could see a small stove and a table—this was plainly the twins' kitchen.

"Dandelions is wholesome, and good for rheumatics," observed Miss Molly. "Sister found a big patch of 'em 'cross the road. We have 'em every spring, for dinner."

"I never ate any," remarked Bob, politely, "but I've always heard they were—er—medicinal."

The rain was dripping steadily down in little streams into the foot-tub and the dish-pan. Betty, Bob said afterward, was beginning to take notes. As special agent of Providence she began to ply Miss Molly with artfully-put questions, finding out all about that simple-hearted lady and her sister in a very few minutes. They had no income, except what they earned. Miss Matty farmed—they owned about ten acres, and she hired the land plowed. Miss Molly took in plain sewing. They made ends meet, somehow. Garden? Oh, no—they raised chickens; poultry and gardens didn't go together. Miss Molly relished an egg, and they sold them in the village, when they had any to spare; hens didn't do so well, somehow.

Through the open door of the lean-to several friendly fowls strolled, poking inquiring heads into the living-room.

"Come here, Banty," called Miss Molly, and a tiny hen scuttled in and sprang upon her mistress's knee. Not to be outdone, the others came boldly forward. Miss Molly called them all by name; there was "Frizzly," and "Top-knot" and "Muffle-jaw"—a queer mixture of blood and feathers indeed!

"Ain't much use for eggs, but they scratch for their livin', and they are right smart o' company for Sister, times I'm in the field," said Miss Matty, cheerfully, as she came from the lean-to. "Old Top-knot is fixin' to set, Sister, on that darning-gourd I put in her nest."

"Well, see that Frizzly don't pester her, and we'll maybe scare up a settin' some of these days," replied Miss Molly, tranquilly, "won't you-all stay and take a bite o' greens with us? Sister'll put on a hoecake in a minute, if you will."

But, though Miss Matty hospitably echoed the invitation, Bob and Betty declined with earnest thanks—they must be getting back to town, as the sun had come out once more.

"Funny we found them right away, Bob," bubbled Betty, as they were speeding on their way homeward. "Oh, it's just lovely—the plan I've thought out for Miss Matty and Miss Molly! You wait and see—I won't tell you till it's done."

And, though Bob begged to be taken into the secret, she positively refused to explain—he'd have to wait.

Betty Brandon was alone in the world: her parents had died when she was a child, and she had been brought up by a kindly and loving old grandfather, who, when he was nearing his last days, found himself unexpectedly rich from the proceeds of some property he owned on which oil had been found. The old gentleman had not lived long to enjoy his wealth, but he had built a comfortable home for Betty, installed a relative as housekeeper and entrusted Bob Lowry with the care of her money, and of herself till she was of age and could decide things according to her own judgment.

"Money's a mighty hard thing to take care of, Bob," the old man had confided to his friend, "especially when you've never had a red penny of your own for so long. Betty will be flinging it right and left, for she's a good-hearted child, and wants the world happy. In my judgment, money's a powerful poor article when it comes to buying happiness, but Betty don't know that—you must learn by experience."

Now Betty had come into her own, and there was nothing that Bob could do to prevent her spending it to make the world happy! If only he, Bob Lowry, were not so old and plain and—commonplace, he would ask nothing better than to take care of the radiant child for the rest of his life—and keep her, incidentally, from throwing away her grandfather's money!

He did not see Betty again for some time; when he called at her pleasant home, Mrs. Ray, the relative who lived with her, told him that Betty was away nearly all the time, now.

"And I can't understand what the child's doing, Bob," worried the good lady, "always calling up folks over the telephone—architects, and landscape gardeners, and people in the city. Expensive, all this long-distance telephoning, I tell her; but her eyes are shining and she's just absorbed in some plan—a beautiful surprise, she says, for somebody."

After a while they knew. Betty, with eyes that shone like the very brightest of stars, and a face so radiant that all the world smiled to behold it, came to Bob's office in her little car—that was not so very new by now, and took him out in the country—to show him the consummation of her plan.

Beyond the little dusty shanty wherein lived Miss Molly, Miss Matty, Speckle, Frizzle, and the rest of them, they drove, and then up a hill covered with a pleasant growth of trees, fields and orchards, to a spick and shining little house right on its summit. A little house set in a carefully-laid-out garden, with a view from its sunny porch that took in road and river and fields far, far away—even a view of the distant town.

"Come right on in," bustled Betty, "isn't the view just charming? Won't Miss Molly love to sit in that special chair in the corner and watch the road, and just take in all the beauty that's spread before her, poor old dear! And Miss Matty—Bob, just let me show you the kitchen! And a kitchen garden, all planted and growing!"

She led the dazed lawyer through the little house, showing him everything—the comfortably furnished big living-room, the bedrooms and bath, the pantry loaded with beautiful things in glass and tins that shone and glowed with the hues of the rainbow. There was a kitchen, immaculate, with a cabinet, all furnished, and a stove that shone like a mirror. And, outside, there was a garden, trim and neat, with rows of young green things peeping up bravely. There was a chicken-yard, wherein lordly fowls of aristocratic and proven lineage strutted proudly. A fairy creation, invoked by the magic wand of money!

Bob, amazed, dazed, could only blink wonderingly as she displayed each new convenience with pride that spoke possession.

"And to think, the old souls will just move in and be happy and comfortable forever and ever. Isn't that worth-while work for an agent of Providence, Bob?"

"Will they know you have done this for them?" asked Bob, doubtfully.

"No—oh no. That would spoil everything. The agent is to turn over the keys to them, and they'll live here and never, never find out their fairy godmother! And, when Mrs. Ray and I come back from our trip to California, next fall, we'll come out here and see how everything works."

"I hope it will work out all right," said Bob, and there was a note of doubt in his voice that Betty declared was abominable—as if there could be any doubt about it!

Betty and Mrs. Ray were gone all summer; the world seemed a very blank and bare old planet to Bob Lowry, who missed the bright presence of the agent of Providence till his heart ached with loneliness.

He was so very lonely that one day he drove out to look at the little dream-house—the fairy gift; not to visit its inmates, he was too true to Betty to go without her, but just to see how things were looking.

It was late, getting on to autumn, and things should have attained perfection in the gardens, and there would doubtless be flocks of lordly, pedigreed poultry in the hen-yard.

As he neared the dusty shanty by the roadside he was astonished to see a smoke-wreath curling briskly from the chimney—he wondered who could be found to live in such a hovel.

"By George," muttered Bob, softly, "if there isn't Miss Matty, as sure as shooting!"

Miss Matty it was; standing very serenely in the doorway, and nodding a friendly greeting.

Bob drew up at the roadside—this demanded investigation, he would know the reason why the old ladies still lived in the shanty instead of the fairy cottage.

"It's that young feller that come last spring with the pretty girl, Sister," said Miss Matty to Miss Molly, within. "Come right in, young man—it ain't raining, but we're glad to see company, just the same."

By the window, close to the fireside, sat Miss Molly, her crutches beside her, her eyes fixed on the outside, in search of passers by.

"I seen you," she said, as he entered, "and I told Sister to hail you. Young man, where's that powerful pretty girl? I'd like to see her again."

"She's out West," Bob explained, "and—er—are you still living here?"

"Where in tunket would we be a livin'?" Miss Molly spoke, sharply. Miss Matty, nodding towards Bob, whispered. "Let's tell him about it, Sister."

Both started; they poured forth the strange story in a flood of speech. Somebody—nobody knew who—had willed them a house.

"And we had one—all's wanted was a little patchin'."

"And a chicken-yard—hens p'int blank like one another never could tell 'em apart——"

"And a pantry loaded with these here canned things——never tasted nothin' come out of a can, 'count o' this here newfangled thing that poisons folks."

"And a garden; and, name o' sense, how can we tend a garden, and feed all them hens, and keep up a flower yard on top o' that! Me one to do it all," declared Miss Matty, bitterly.

"And taxes to pay on the place," groaned Miss Molly, "and insurance even, to keep up, the man said, if we didn't want to resk burnin' up some night. Land knows, it's all me and Sister can do to take care o' this here farm, we was born and bred on!"

"And what have you done with this place that was a gift?" asked Bob, his legal brain in a very befuddled condition at the old ladies' amazing statements.

"Well, seein's the man told us it was ours, and couldn't nothin' nor nobody touch us for troublin' things, we sold them chickens and that canned stuff to our grocery man in the village, cheap. I wanted to patch the roof, but Sister allowed we'd better lay the money by for taxes, which are bound to come, sure's death. It'll have to burn down without insurance, for we ain't got the money. But Mister, I wonder now if you don't know somebody that'd like the place for a home? We'd rent cheap, just for enough to pay taxes and insurance."

"I'd never live in it," vowed Miss Molly, "such a fur piece from the big road can't see nobody passin'. Yes—we'd be powerful glad to rent it, that we would."

"I'll see about it and let you know," promised the lawyer, as he rose to go. "I'll be back—soon."

"We'd be plumb fraid to sell, wouldn't we, Sister?" ventured Miss Matty, "because we don't rightfully know how we come by it. Sellin', all furnished that-a-way, would save us worryin' over taxes and insurance, wouldn't it?"

"It would," nodded Miss Molly, emphatically, adding darkly: "Some folks is too meddlesome by natur'—entirely too meddlesome!"

"I'm a lawyer," stated Bob, with a dreadful fear that maybe Betty's fairy-godmother gift would fall into alien hands, "and I can look up the deeds and so on for you. And, if it's all regular and shipshape, I'll buy it myself; I've been wanting a home of my own for a long time—a little house just about like that one."

Which was absolutely true.

He searched—and found everything shipshape, as a matter of course. Assuring Miss Matty and Miss Molly of this, he promptly bought the little place, and paid therefor a sum that was not princely, but the magnitude of which covered Miss Matty and Miss Molly with confusion as to what they should do with so much wealth.

Then he found himself motoring out to the little house evenings, looking about; then he took to spending an occasional night, then every night, and at last even to cooking his own breakfast and supper on the dainty little stove, and enjoying it very much indeed.

And he began to work in the gardens, hoping to make things look presentable before Betty's return; it was sorely neglected, but by dint of patient—and needed—exercise, he soon had trim flower beds, and thrifty vegetables growing in the kitchen garden.

Late one afternoon in the early autumn, when he boldly took a half-holiday from his office because the dahlias needed tying up, Bob, bending over the stakes, whistling softly, saw a shadow fall between him and the pale sunshine. Looking up quickly he beheld—Betty.

"Betty!" he shouted, and, before he had time to collect his thoughts, held out open arms to her in a frenzy of love and longing, "Betty—you?"

Straight into the circle of those honest arms went Betty, and snuggled right up close to the big heart that was, just then, beating rather violently under the big man's vest.

"I've found out, Bob," murmured Betty, in a broken voice, "I went to your office, hoping to surprise you and found it closed. So I came on out here. And——" she gulped back a miserable sob, "stopped at—at Miss Matty and Miss Molly's shanty. And I f—fully agree with them that some folks are too meddlesome—too darn meddlesome! And, as an agent of Providence I'm a f-fake—and a—f-failure!"

No matter how unworthy a man may deem himself, when a helpless girl snuggles up in his arms, with evident intention to stay there for some time, that man is simply obliged to keep them around her as closely as possible; and so strive to convey his appreciation of the honor done him.

"I'm old and plain and commonplace, and you should have a lover who is young and handsome and altogether desirable," he began, very humbly, "but—but—darling child, if you could manage to put up with me, I'll be willing to let you take care of me for the rest of my natural life—and do it after your own way, too. I need being cared for a whole heap more than Miss Matty and Miss Molly. Could you—will you, Betty, darling?"

"No!" stormed Betty, in a gust of weeping, her voice muffled but vigorous, "I'm not fit to take care of a cat! But I'll be so very, very glad to have you take care of me, Bob, dear!"

There could be but one answer to this plea. And Bob Lowry took means to make that answer emphatic enough without a single word! After a space of time—a considerable space—had elapsed, Betty raised a bright head from his shoulder—they were now sitting on the doorstep—and, with eyes that sparkled with a sudden new and beautiful thought, spoke eagerly: "And may we have our honeymoon right here, in your own dear little cottage, Bob? I'd love it so!"

"We will," promised Bob, promptly, "in my house and in my heart—I won't dare trust you at large! You see, since you are intrusted to my care, I'm going to regard myself as a—er—special agent of Providence appointed for the purpose of making you happy—and I know I'll succeed!"

Wasn't that just like a man!

A Bit of Mid-Summer Madness

of the portico and looked out over the ocean. The night was hot, decidedly so; but every now and then an invigorating breeze swept up from the ocean, over which a full moon hung.

He stood for some time in the shadow of the colonnade while the evening twilight gave way to night and the moon increased in effulgence.

No one was near—he was alone with the moon for company and it was going to his head, he thought, when, as if by a spirit hand, he felt his own gently touched, and a voice low and guarded, spoke his name.

He threw his head and shoulder about and saw the woman he had noted in the dining-room.

"Mr. Poindexter." His name was spoken again. Not knowing what to make of it all, he bowed.

"You see I know you," she said softly, "though you do not know me. May I ask, nay, may I implore your help? I am in great trouble. Will you help me?"

His gallantry immediately responded.

"If my reply does not constitute an irrevocable promise, yes," he replied.

"Then save me from the police!"

Russian! Beyond a doubt, Russian! No one else would speak in that fashion.

"May I speak with you privately?" she asked. And then she evidently knew the request made him just a little uncomfortable, for she went on quietly: "You will not compromise yourself, and you will help me. The detectives are not sure of me, and if they see me with you who are known so well here, they will think we are friends, and I shall baffle them. Your social standing is above suspicion. Shall you help me?"

Poindexter did not hesitate. He was not averse to an adventure and especially with a pretty woman on mid-summer night. In the old days pixies and elves appeared on this evening to mortals and indulged in pranks, so why should he not enjoy an adventurous revel with—well not a fairy queen exactly, but with a queen, nevertheless? And with one so beautiful and who spoke with the clear accent of an American-born? He was glad she had no accent, a Russian accent would have at once suggested caviar!

"I'll help you," he said, surrendering.

"Very well. Meet me at the entrance of the hotel and we'll walk in the grove and there I'll

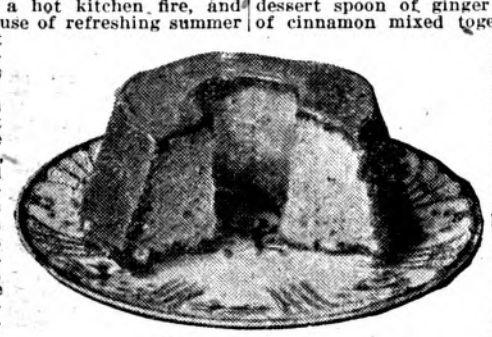
SUMMER COOKING MADE EASY

—o—



JAM AND JELLY RECIPES

By Violet Marsh

"EVERY morning the world wakes up hungry" and every morning, whether summer or winter, the larger per cent of women in the world are preparing food to appease the hunger of all mankind. And just as the busy bee makes and stores its honey against the time when change of season cuts off its food supply, so does the thrifty housewife preserve food by which she may vary a more or less monotonous winter diet and furnish greens, mineral matter, acids and other necessary materials that keep the body in a healthful condition. At the same time she is greatly reducing the cost of good food.

This month we are going to talk especially about hot weather cooking, in an effort to eliminate some of the discomfort which attends long hours of working over a hot kitchen fire, and about making a greater use of refreshing summer foods and dishes that can be prepared in advance in the cool hours of the morning.

SPONGE CAKE.

August is the month when special thought must be given to the family diet. Greasy food, fried dishes, pastry and doughnuts are unwholesome in hot weather. In their place use fresh fish if obtainable, milk, fresh vegetables, tapioca and gelatine desserts, simple cookies and sponge cakes, fresh fruit shortcakes and plenty of refreshing fruit drinks, specially between meals. Cream cheese is an excellent meat substitute in summer and if made with care, and for variety mixed with fruits, the family will never tire of it. Sandwiches are a standby in hot weather and it is well worth while to make a study of the family taste for fillings, which are many and varied when "garden-stuff" is abundant. Encourage out-of-door eating; not elaborate picnics or lunches, but just a basket of sandwiches, sweet fruit, milk and cheese, and enjoy that summer-time relaxation away from tablecloths, linen napkins and many dishes.

Summer Recipes

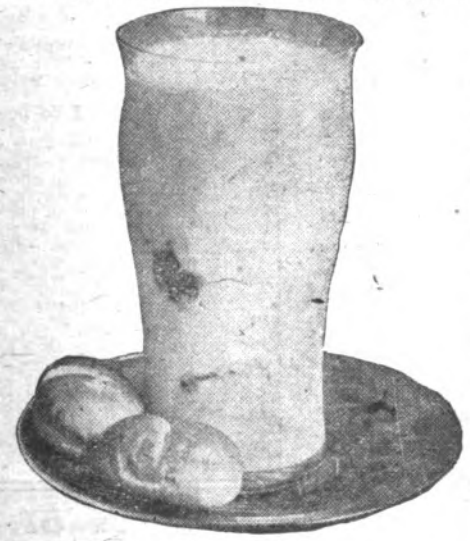
MY COTTAGE CHEESE.—Without disturbing the milk after it is put into a large, shallow pan, let it stand until it becomes a firm clabber. Make a cotton bag of muslin, not too thin, and into it dip the milk, cream and all, breaking the clabber as little as possible. It is well to first move the cream to the middle of the pan, putting it into the bag after the first half of the clabber. Tie the bag with a strong string and hang it up to drip in the sun or near the kitchen stove. The sun is preferable. Hang a cloth around it if any flies are about. It should hang all day. Remove from bag and work in a very little salt. If more cream is desired, work in a little heavy fresh cream.

For combinations, add just before serving cut up dates prepared by standing five minutes in boiling hot water, then five minutes in cold water when the dirt and skins will easily rub off. Cheese combined with chopped green peppers, celery or new cabbage makes excellent sandwiches. A little peanut butter with the cheese, and the addition of a few small seedless raisins that have been washed and dried will delight the children. A lettuce leaf topped with a slice of pineapple and a thick spread of cheese pleases everybody. Try a thin sprinkling of ground nut meats with the cheese seasoned with red pepper for a pleasing variety; also try strawberry jam and cheese.

EGG AND SARDINE.—Remove the backbones and skins if the sardines are large. Mash and make into a paste with hard-boiled eggs that have been chopped and seasoned with salt and pepper and a little of the sardine oil.

HAM AND CUCUMBER.—Grind the ham and season with mayonnaise dressing. Soak thin slices of cucumber in ice water and add a layer to the ham. These are excellent.

FRUIT GELATINE.—Slice two very ripe bananas thin and pour over them two cups of fresh berry juice. Most kinds combine well with banana. Add half-a-cup of lemon juice and two cups of sugar. Let this stand one hour. Soak four tablespoons of granulated gelatine in one half cup of cold water until well softened and then add one half cup of boiling water. Stir a little until the gelatine is dissolved and then pour hot over the fruit and sugar. Continue gently stirring until the sugar is thoroughly dissolved and then set to cool. As the gelatine begins to stiffen, stir occasionally to prevent the bananas rising to the top. May be set in individual glasses and topped with whipped cream.



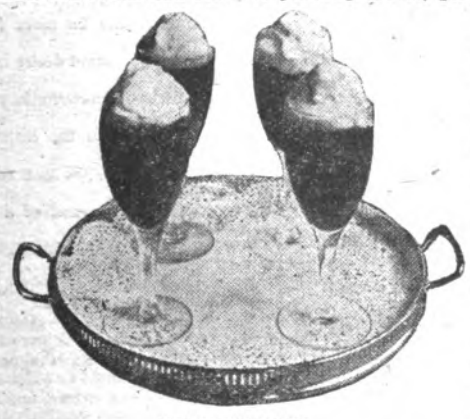
TAPIOCA DESSERT.—Two cups of water, one cup of sugar and one large cup of fine tapioca cooked in double boiler until tapioca is dissolved. Stir frequently as it cooks. Just before removing from boiler, add two cups of any kind of fruit or berry juice, stir and pour into deep bowl. When nearly cool and beginning to set, add two stiffly beaten egg whites, whipping them in with the egg beater.

SHORTCAKE.—Measure two cups of sifted flour, add one half teaspoon of salt, one half teaspoon of soda and one teaspoon of cream of tartar, and sift again. Beat one egg, add three quarters of a cup of sweet milk and one quarter of a cup of melted (not hot) butter, stir and add to flour. Turn onto floured board, and with the hands pat and shape into thin round cakes that will fit Washington pie tins. Bake in a hot oven until brown. Split and butter while hot, and fill and pour over the top any kind of sweetened fresh fruit.

GINGERBREAD.—One cup of sugar, one cup of molasses, two even tablespoons of butter, one level dessert spoon of ginger and one level teaspoon of cinnamon mixed together. Warm enough to melt the butter, which will be very little, and then beat the whole mixture until onsiderably lighter in color. Dissolve two teaspoons of soda in a very little hot water and stir in one cup of sour milk. When well mixed, add five even cups of sifted flour. Beat hard several minutes and bake in a shallow pan in a moderately hot oven.

SPONGE CAKE.—Beat the yolks of three eggs until light yellow, add one and one half cup of granulated sugar and beat again. Put into a mixing bowl, add one teaspoon of vanilla, one scant half a cup of cold water and with the egg beater beat until creamy. Add two cups of flour sifted with one slightly rounded teaspoon of cream of tartar and one half teaspoon of soda. Beat hard until fine grained and no longer. Lastly add three beaten whites of eggs. Fold egg whites in until they disappear with an over-and-over stroke. Bake in a moderate oven, slightly increasing heat at the last.

BAKED TOMATOES.—Select well ripened but not over-soft tomatoes. Cut a slice from the blossom end deep enough to remove the center and seeds. Make a dressing of bread-crumbs lightly moistened and seasoned with butter, salt and pepper. Chopped ham or chicken may be added. Fill and heap the tomatoes with the dressing, top each with a piece of butter and bake in a hot oven half an hour.



SUMMER DRINKS.

TOMATO SALAD.—Peel large, ripe tomatoes, cut in halves and remove top part of centers and seeds. Fill with cucumber that has been pared and soaked in cold water and chopped just before adding. Top each with a large spoon of mayonnaise and place it on a crisp lettuce leaf.

VEGETABLE SALAD.—Until tried, one does not realize how delicious a combination of cold cooked vegetables is a dish long famous with the French people. Cold string beans, carrots, beets, peas, a little spinach, lima beans and cold diced potato. In fact, whatever is on hand may be deliciously combined with a French or mayonnaise dressing and served as the base of a good meal. Fresh uncooked tomato, cucumber, celery or peppers are an appetizing addition.

Summer Drinks

Of first importance in making delectable summer drinks is to avoid too much sweetening. Next is in serving them at just the right temperature. If too cold the flavor is dulled, and if warm they are insipid. About the temperature of cold well water is about right. A quart preserving jar makes an excellent shaker. Syrups can be made and kept on hand in bottles. Fruit vinegars, and fruit syrups may also be prepared and kept the same as canned fruits. Besides being useful in drinks, you have the foundation for pudding sauces, gelatines, etc.

FRUIT GELATINE.

PLAIN SYRUP.—Take equal measures of cold water and sugar. Stir until partly dissolved and then slowly cook ten minutes. Skim carefully and bottle.

RASPBERRY SHRUB.—Dissolve five ounces of tartaric acid in two quarts of soft cold water and pour it over twelve pounds of whole ripe raspberries, and, without stirring, let it stand forty-eight hours. Drain through cheesecloth. Measure the juice and to each pint add two cups of sugar, stirring until dissolved. It should stand several days in a covered crock in a cold cellar and have an occasional stir. Put into bottles with cork stoppers. It is not cooked but will keep a long time if put in a dark and cold place. Dilute to taste.

GINGERADE.—Put two rounding tablespoons of good ground ginger into one quart of water and simmer half an hour. Strain through a cloth. Add one cup of lemon juice, one and a half cup of orange juice, a little of the grated rind of both, and two cups of sugar. When the sugar is dissolved it is ready for immediate use, but if to be kept, boil one minute and seal in sterilized jars or bottles. Use according to taste, shaking water and syrup together.

CHOCOLATE SYRUP.—Stir six tablespoons of grated chocolate with three cups of granulated sugar and two teaspoons of corn-starch. Make into a paste by slowly stirring in two cups of cold water. Add two cups of boiling water and boil hard for five minutes, stirring constantly. Pour into hot sterilized jars and keep in a cool, dark place unless to be used within a few days. To use, add one quarter of a cup of syrup to a large glass of rich milk, shaking thoroughly.

BERRY SYRUPS.—Use any kind of table berries. Mash by hand or through a fruit press; the latter process yields more juice. Measure and add one half the amount of sugar. Bring to a boil, skim and seal. By adding an equal amount of sugar and stirring until it dissolves, the juice may be put into sterilized bottles uncooked.

FRUIT PUNCH.—Add one pint of clear, strong tea to three cups of plain syrup, two cups of grated pineapple, the juice of four lemons, two limes and six oranges, one cup of banana pulp, two cups of uncooked strawberry or uncooked grape juice. Dilute to taste.

Jams and Jellies

Fruits that are to be made into jellies should be fresh picked and ripe, but not over-ripe. Where one raises her own fruits, or buys locally and knows when they are picked, the best results will be obtained if fruit is gathered following two or more days of sunshine without rain. The juices will be of a finer quality, both in flavor and consistency.

No water is added to juicy fruits. They are crushed in the kettle, boiled hard until the texture is broken down and immediately poured into the jelly bag to drain. Fruits like crab-apples that are cut up, are covered with boiling water and boiled hard until the pulp cooks and the juices are drawn out.

The use of too much sugar causes many a jelly failure. If there is too much to the amount of pectin, it will be sticky and not hold up.

I usually make two qualities of jelly, first and second. The first is permitted to drain undisturbed for a considerable time through two thicknesses of cheese-cloth. This juice will be clear and make perfect jelly. For the second quality I squeeze the bag and thereby obtain a cloudy juice, but its flavor is just as good.

Many fruits have a delicious flavor but do not contain sufficient pectin to jelly. These are combined with over fruits. Delicious combinations are quince and pear, strawberry and crab-apple, raspberry and currant, cherries and grape, blackberries and currants, plums and quince. In these jellies use the peel and cores of quince. Jelly should have a thick coat of hot paraffin poured over it as soon as it is "made."

It is well worth the price of a small fruit press just to use in making jellies and fruit juices, for by its use all the juice is squeezed from the raw fruit, leaving only a dry pulp which is of no value. When the juice is extracted by cooking and together with the pulp put to drain, there is a great loss of juice as well as flavor. This is readily proven in the difference of weight between what remains to throw away after squeezing through a press and what is left in the jelly bag even after being squeezed for a "second" quality when the fruit is first cooked. Such a press is most valuable for making a glass of fresh grape juice, or in winter for making a pitcher of fresh cider from the stored apples.

PERFECT CURRANT JELLY.—Put currants through a fruit press. Bring the juice just to a boil, skimming carefully. Drain through cheese-cloth. Measure juice, add sugar pound to pint, and stir until it is dissolved. Fill hot sterilized glasses and set in the strong sunshine to "sun-make." It may take two or three weeks if the weather is humid, but in the end it will become firm and taste like fresh fruit.

CURRANT JELLY, NO. 2.—Add one quart of water to four quarts of currants on the stem and boil hard for half an hour. Drain. To each pint of juice allow one pint of sugar. Heat the sugar in the oven, stirring occasionally. Boil the juice hard for fifteen minutes and skim. Slowly add sugar and stir until dissolved and put into glasses.

QUINCE JELLY.—Peel the quinces and cut out the cores and cover with cold water. Add the remainder of quince cut in small pieces. As quinces are hard, they should cook several hours. Add more water as it boils out. Drain over night through two thicknesses of cheese-cloth. In the morning measure the juice and allow three quarters of the amount of sugar. Boil the juice hard for fifteen minutes and add the sugar heated. When dissolved, pour into glasses.

UNCOOKED JAMS.—Many are very successful with this recipe and declare the fruit tastes nearly as good as when fresh picked. Weigh the fruit, allowing an equal weight of sugar. Crush the fruit thoroughly, stir in the sugar until it dissolves, put into sterilized glasses, and at once cover with half-an-inch of hot paraffin. Strawberries, currants, blackberries, sweet plums and blueberries are the best for this cold process.

COOKED JAM.—Small fruits are cooked whole, and large fruits such as peaches, pears and apples are pared and cut into small pieces. Use equal parts of sugar. Put the fruit into the preserving kettle with one quarter of the sugar and when partly cooked add another quarter, and the remainder at intervals of cooking. In this way the fruit does not harden. Jam is done when a little of the juice thickens in the air.

Wool Prices on Decline

Since November, 1918, the prices of wool have declined in comparison with the same month of the preceding year. The highest average price reached was 60 cents per pound in March and April, 1918, since which time the prices fell to as low a figure as 47.9 cents in April, 1919. In January, 1918, the average price was 58.1 cents; January, 1919, 55.2 cents; and in January, 1920, 53.3 cents. The producers' price of 16.7 cents per pound in 1913 advanced to 58 cents in 1918, and fell to 51 cents in 1919. These figures are in accordance with reports received by the Bureau of Crop Estimates of the United States Department of Agriculture.—Agricult. Dept. Bulletin, Mar. 15, 1920.

Sunset Soap Dyes

Sunset color is boiled in to stay—does not crock, fade or wash out. The gentle boiling does not injure the fabric and is absolutely necessary to make the color fast, causing it to thoroughly penetrate every thread and fiber.

The old, soiled and faded garment is completely transformed by the fresh, brilliant color—really just like new. It is so easy and clean—no stained hands or utensils. Sunset dyes all fabrics, Cotton—Wool—Silk—Mixed goods—the same shade and depth of color, at the same time, in the same dye bath. It is the simplest, safest, surest home dye to use, and the most economical and satisfactory.

Most of the better stores carry Sunset—ask for your favorite color, or send us your dealer's name and fifteen cents and we will mail a cake postpaid.

Cubby Bear at the Seashore

By Lena B. Ellingwood

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

"I WONDER, Cubby Bear," said Billy Bluejay, "that you have never been to the seashore! You never see anything beyond this forest! It is very fashionable to spend part of the summer at the beach. The sand is fine to play in, the salt water is delightful for bathing, and the ocean is a beautiful sight, with its white-topped waves."

"I have heard of the ocean," said Cubby Bear, "but I have never seen it. Neither has Mamma Bruin, nor even Grandma Bear. I wonder how far it is from here!"

"Not so far but that you could make the journey in two or three days—perhaps four. And I am not fooling you as Wild Goose did last fall, when she made you believe you could go south with her!" And Billy chuckled loudly.

But Cubby did not like to be reminded of his "Wild Goose chase."

"I would like to go to the seashore," said Cubby, "but I do not know the way, and if I did, Mamma Bruin would never let me go alone."

"I was coming to that!" exclaimed Billy Bluejay. "I had a talk with Mr. Wise Owl today, and he is putting his house and his feathers in order, getting ready to take a vacation."

"Oh, is he going to the seashore?" cried Cubby.

"You interrupt!" grumbled Billy. "Yes, I was trying to tell you so, and that he wants a companion to go with him, so he will not be lonely. I would not care to go with him myself—he is not lively enough for me—but perhaps you would not mind that."

"Oh, no! I like Mr. Wise Owl, and I am sure that Mamma Bruin would be willing for me to go in his care. Thank you for telling me, Billy Bluejay."

Cubby Bear hurried away, greatly excited, and was quite out of breath by the time he reached Wise Owl's house.

"Oh, please," he cried eagerly, as soon as he could speak, "may I go to the seashore with you?"

Wise Owl looked up blankly, then his eyes lighted up as he saw who his visitor was.

"Well, now! You are just the one—just the one! Why, we shall have a delightful time together! There is a piece of woods where I am going, not far from the shore, and we can hide there days and come out to see the sights by night."

"Oh!" faltered Cubby. "Can we be out only at night?"

"There are cottages near, where people stay. You would not want them to see you, I suppose?" asked Wise Owl, rather sharply.

"N-no!" answered Cubby.

"Can you be ready to start tonight, after dark?"

"Yes, I will run home now to get ready and tell Mamma Bruin."

Mamma Bruin was willing for him to go.

"Perhaps I will visit you while you are there," she said.

"I wonder if I am too old to go," said old Grandma Bear. "I should like a sight of the ocean!"

Then she sang, in a queer, shaky voice,

"Out o'er the bounding billow I would swim, swim,
And if I came across a whale, I'd have a chat with him.
Then, if he splashed around, I'd bid him stop, stop, stop;
For when I swim I never plan to touch a water drop."

Cubby Bear and Mr. Wise Owl made the journey to the seashore in four nights, finding good hiding places to sleep in the daytime. Cubby would have liked better to travel by daylight, but found no fault, doing as Wise Owl preferred.

Before they came in sight of the ocean, they could hear the sound of the waves.

"There is a rocky, ledgy place where the waves beat roughly," said Wise Owl. "But not far from there you will find the smooth, warm, sandy beach where the tide comes creeping up gently."

"Can we go bathing?" asked Cubby.

"You may, but I shall not," answered Wise Owl. "If I take cold, I have bronchitis. See, we are coming to the edge of the woods now! Near here we shall sleep days! Hurry, and we shall soon see the ocean!"

They crossed an open space, where thin, coarse grass was growing, then clambered up a great, rough, rocky ledge, and there, before them, stretched out the mighty ocean, a great waste of waters, as far as the eye could see.

"Oh, oh!" cried Cubby. "I never thought it could be so big!"

Below them the dark waters swirled, tossing up white, frothy foam where the waves beat against the rocks.

It was a beautiful night, calm and warm. The full moon sailed through the sky, making a pathway of dancing light across the water. It looked to Cubby Bear like a friendly, familiar face.

"I did not think the moon would be here, too!" he said.

"OH, OH!" CRIED CUBBY BEAR, "I NEVER THOUGHT IT COULD BE SO BIG."

"The moon is a great traveler, and sees more sights than you and I shall ever see. I call this place my rock," said Wise Owl, settling down in a little hollow. "I come here every summer for a while. Many a night I have sat here for hours, watching the moonlight on the water. It is a sight of which I never tire."

"Look! There is nice, white sand," Cubby exclaimed, pointing as he spoke. "May I go down there to play?"

"Yes, indeed. Play all you want to. I shall not leave this spot until the moon goes down."

"Does the moon come up out of the water?" asked Cubby.

"I think it very likely," answered Wise Owl. "How could it keep so clean and shining if it never took a bath?"

Cubby had a happy time playing in the sand. He dug holes near the ocean and watched them fill with water. He waded out as far as he could go and keep his head above water. He had been swimming in the Big Brook at home, and once in the river, when he had fallen in, but the ocean was rather terrifying, because of its vast size, and he did not quite dare to swim in it then, although he tried it afterward, as you shall hear.

Early in the morning, they went into the woods, and Cubby found a bed in a little hollow, quite hidden in a thicket of bushes, while Wise Owl chose a sleeping place high up in a tree.

Cubby Bear was very tired, and slept soundly all day, never waking until darkness had fallen, and Mr. Wise Owl called him with a loud, solemn "Hoo-oo, whoo!"

Then he scrambled out of his little hollow, and was ready for another night of fun. He found at the water's edge some scraps of fish which a fisherman had left there, and made a good meal of them, while Wise Owl hunted around and found a supper—or breakfast—to suit himself.

"I shall sleep nearer the sea tomorrow," decided Cubby Bear. "I am sure I can make a good, safe place."

So, after the bright moon came up, and Wise Owl was perched in his favorite place, watching the pathway of silvery light across the water, Cubby Bear went prowling about to find his sleeping place. Some distance from Wise Owl's lookout, he found a large rock overhanging a strip of clean, white sand. He had to wade in the water around some more rocks to reach it.

"This is the very place," he thought. "I will dig a hole far back here, and shall be quite safe; for if the people from the cottages climb the rocks they cannot see me underneath, and if they go out in boats, the sand I shall pile up will hide me."

He dug away busily, and after his bed was made to suit him, he went up on the rocks where Wise Owl sat. He did not tell Wise Owl about changing his sleeping place. Afterward he found it would have been wiser to do so, for Wise Owl knew the ways of the ocean better than he.

"Good by," he said. "I think I will go to bed now."

"So soon?" asked Wise Owl in surprise. "You are tired from playing so hard. Well, go on! I will come later."

Cubby Bear never knew how long he had been sleeping, when he suddenly woke, with a gasp, to hear a roaring noise, and find his hollow filled with water. As he tried to clamber out, wet and frightened, a big wave knocked him back. His head hit a sharp edge of rock, and he gave a cry of pain. He felt dizzy and confused, and did not at all understand what was happening. He had not known the tide would rise and cover his nice little bed.

"I shall not drown here if I can help it!" he thought, and struggled bravely to get out.

This was not like swimming in the Big Brook, or in the calm, smooth river. The waves buffeted him, the rocks seemed to thrust themselves out to hurt him, the salt water was in his eyes, his nose, his mouth.

"Poor me!" he sighed in self-pity. "When I get safely out, if I do, I shall lie down on the sand and cry. But I cannot stop for that now!"

He passed the dangerous rocks, and was out in the smoother water which rolled up over the sandy beach, when he heard a shout.

"Oh-oo! Willie, look, look! What's that in the water over there? I b'lieve it's my big Teddy Bear, a-swimming!"

"No, sir!" shouted another excited voice. "'Tain't Teddie! It's a real, live bear!"

Dear, dear! There were children playing on the beach!

"Oh, what shall I do now?" poor Cubby Bear asked himself.

One thing was clear—he would not stay in the big ocean! He had had enough of that.

He scrambled up on the beach, but there was no time to lie down and cry, as he had planned. Instead, he ran fast as his wet paws would take him, in the direction of the woods. He would rather be caught than drowned!

But the children were as frightened as he. Away they dashed, with a chorus of piercing shrieks, leaving buckets, dolls and hats lying in the sand.

Cubby Bear gained the shelter of the woods, and calling Mr. Wise Owl from his slumbers, told the story of his adventures.

"I am going home!" he said. "I shall be happier in my own pleasant forest. I am glad I have seen the ocean, but it is too large, and too salt, and too wild! I like Big Brook better, for its waters are pleasant to drink, and it stays where it belongs!"

Crumbs of Comfort

Be natural.

Truth is tough.

Life is an investment.

To do good is a privilege.

Tomorrow is everyman's day.

Great men will; feeble men wish.

From yesterday there is no appeal.

The light of every soul burns upward.

Wealth creates more wants than it supplies.

Victory is beautiful; but never cheaply bought.

He who does not repent is the true transgressor.

It is just as hard to boss money as it is to boss men.

True wisdom will make our words and acts the same.

The world is a great mirror and gives us back ourselves.

A quiet wood can be more friendly than a crowded street.

Human life is constant desire and should be a constant prayer.

No first-class substitute for knowledge has yet been discovered.

The music is not in the instrument, but in the soul of the player.

Consider well what you most admire, for it is that you will imitate.

The greatest punishment of a wrong is the conviction of having done it.

We love a man for his little failings rather than for his virtues which we respect.

Plant trees; they will convert a barren and monotonous spot into an earthly paradise.

Man ceases to be a worshiper of God only when he has at last become a worshiper of self.

If the whole world should agree to speak nothing but the truth, speech would be much shortened.

There is a scale of virtues, and if we would mount the highest steps we must commence with the lowest.

There is no power in the world which can force us to make the same mistakes, to suffer the same regrets over again.

No preacher is listened to but time, which will give us the same train of thought and advice that the old and wise have in vain tried to put in our heads.

Thank God every morning when you get up that you have something to do which must be done whether you like it or not. Being forced to work, and forced to do your best, will breed in you temperance, self-control, diligence, strength of will, content and a thousand virtues that the idle will never know.

LEAGUE RULES: To be a comfort to one's parents. To protect the weak and aged. To be kind to dumb animals. To love our country and protect its flag.

CONDUCTED BY UNCLE CHARLIE

COMFORT for one year and admittance to the League of Cousins for only 55 cents. Join at once. Everybody welcome. ADDRESS all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. See Instructions at the close of this Department.

HOP up onto my lap and let's have a heart-searching talk regarding conditions in our country, which, if there is any American blood in your veins, should cause you more than one sleepless night. Incidentally, I should like to read you the following letter. I have had scores like it and they have heartened me greatly: "Calhoun, La. Dear Uncle Charlie: Your contribution to May COMFORT is the best I ever read. You are a wonderful writer (excuse me while I faint). With your permission, we will send your article to the Nashville and New Orleans Christian Advocate. We need more such talks as you have put forth. Pity you are physically disabled. I would want you nominated for President. Your friend, Mrs. J. L. Lay."

I am proud, dear friend, of your letter, and it touches me deeply to know that I can influence so many thousands of you good people and fill your hearts with enthusiasm for the nobler things of life. I can conceive of no greater honor than being President of a United States that was united heart and soul and one hundred per cent American, and I can conceive of no more thankless, undesirable, heart-breaking job than to be President of a United States, largely comprised of contending, unassimilated racial units. If things continue as at present, in a short time the more aggressive of our racial groups will control all the other groups and make and unmake Presidents at will. Certain elements are trying to do that very thing as I write. Some of these groups want to punish the Allies and ourselves for licking Germany and so bring the Hun back to the gates of Paris. We are woefully short of vision, and without vision the good perish, while the evil, who always have their eyes peeled for trouble, will survive and flourish. Liberty can only be retained at the cost of eternal vigilance. Down one menace, as we downed the Kaiser, and up pops another. This morning's paper contains an item which confirms certain predictions I made months ago, and which may at any time be fulfilled. Ponder over this dispatch which comes from one of the oldest of all European capitals—would that I could print it all! "So strong is our position in America that we believe no President can be elected without first having pledged himself * * *. Both the Republican and Democratic parties are scrambling over each other to obtain (our) * * * votes and support. Hence the * * * who smashed the Peace Treaty * * * are sufficiently powerful to prevent the election of a President who is not favorable to our cause. They are strong enough to impose a candidate," etc. That's exactly what I told you would happen. Democrats and Republicans are to scramble for the tremendously powerful hyphenated votes within and we are to have our Presidents imposed on us by alien breeds who receive their orders from abroad. Thus, thanks to outside influences and faithless politicians angling for votes and an indifferent public, representative government is to disappear and you are to be conquered without firing a shot, because those who wish to dominate us never sleep, while you are never awake. To this the United States was foredoomed when, seventy years ago, it permitted itself to be made the world's dumping ground, the paradise of men who had not and still have not a single basic idea in common with those who drove out the Indian and built here a structure of liberty which is to be replaced (if you do not instantly awaken to the danger that confronts you) by the moth-eaten, outworn, soul-crushing, tyrannical systems of the Old World. The old American stock which made this country great and whose ideals are still the vital element in our national life, have declined to work or breed—they have committed race suicide. Our immigration tables tell the story and it is a heart-breaking one. The unassimilated, plotting alien has scrambled the egg of genuine Americanism and I fear there is no power on earth that can put that egg back in its old original shape. We have been living in a fool's paradise. School histories and braggart sheets and the hysterical mouthings of the degenerate gutter press have so filled us with self-satisfaction and national egotism that we never have a national stock taking, never size up the elements which compose our vast population and carefully note what those elements are doing. The alien cubs that Uncle Sam adopted as pets have grown so strong and lusty that he can no longer handle them and without an iron hand he himself must submit to be handled and mangled. Before I would consent to be President of these United States, I would insist on a national house-cleaning—insist that everyone go into the melting pot, and those that declined to melt I would deport. Like glorious Teddy, I would talk softly and carry a big stick. I would be master in my own house or seek some country that did not permit its politicians to play off dangerous, unassimilated racial groups, one against the other, so as to retain office and power. Every individual differs and each has a different "bug," a different idea of how things should be run and just what he should get out of the deal. But no matter how we may differ on the running of our complex social machine, I would insist on absolute loyalty to our flag and all that it stands for. I would not object to racial groups as long as they spoke our tongue (and one flag, one language, must be our rallying cry), meeting to discuss the literature of the countries from which their fathers came, but if these gatherings took on a political character or were used for partizan or sectarian purposes which fostered Old World affiliations and bred ideas antagonistic to our institutions, I would crush them instantly. A house divided against itself cannot stand, and our racial divisions are now becoming so menacing that no one knows what a day may bring forth. Already, alien elements seem to hold Congress in the hollow of their hands, and to our eternal disgrace be it said that we, who are about to celebrate the three hundreth anniversary of the coming of the Pilgrim Fathers, are forced to witness the Ambassador of the land of the Pilgrims creeping to his official residence in Washington, like a sneak-thief in the night, while the flag of his country is publicly burned before the Treasury Building in Washington. If an American Ambassador had been subjected to such indignities in the capital of any great power, there would have been instant war. Such exhibitions are brutally crude and crudely brutal; they are what one might expect from fanatics or an ill-mannered child and they either show that Uncle Sam has capitulated or is no longer master in his own house. It is his political mis-representatives who are to blame, for they have not only robbed him of his self-respect and esteem in the eyes of the world but are disgracing both him and our nation. If I were your President and were forced to stand for that brand of insolent alienism, I would pack my trunk and quit.

Our last Congress, while civilization trembled in the balance and the whole country screamed for constructive legislation, gave a fine imitation of a cat and dog menagerie and talked and spent money like a drunken sailor. We cut loose from Europe and told it to work or starve and stew in its juice, one minute, and then immediately commenced to meddle in everybody's business while ignoring our own. All this was merely a gesture to catch the alien vote. If any nation meddles in our affairs it is insolence and we are ready to fight at the drop of the hat, unless it is a Germany with ten million men in the field, then we sit on the fence for three years and wonder if the battle for freedom and democracy had not better be fought by somebody else, for if we got into the fray it might hurt the tender susceptibilities of some of our alien friends within. These unpleasant facts, genuine Americans contemplate with regret, shame and sorrow. We are selling our souls and our ideals for the votes of those who are already planning a governmental system utterly foreign to the ideas of those who made us a nation. We have deluged with sympathy those who did not need it, and turned a deaf ear to the moans of Armenia, the oldest Christian race in the world; Armenia, who saw a million of her scanty population butchered by the devilish Turk; Armenia, a people that no torture, no agony, no horrible form of death can swerve from the path that leads to Calvary. A bare remnant of this great race sits at the foot of the Cross, mutely appealing to us to save them from the final death-stroke. But Armenia has no votes, she had no delegates to send to Chicago or California, and unless you can muster plenty of hyphenated votes, politicians turn a deaf ear. I am glad I am not President of the United States, for if Congress refused my appeal on behalf of these martyred followers of Jesus, I would throw up my job in disgust. It is time Uncle Sam's social, political and economic machinery was thoroughly overhauled by experts. So many monkey-wrenches have been thrown into that machine by political windbags sent by you to Congress that the machine can do nothing but burn money. Hence, general unrest and dissatisfaction. Some effort, too, should be made to cut out the wicked, ungodly, bipartizan strife in Congress which is rapidly bringing our system of government, a government which, theoretically at least, is almost perfect, into contempt. We have too many wrangling, contentious lawyers in Congress and too few big, capable, practical men of affairs, experts versed in science, business, economics and the fundamentals of good government. Managing and running Uncle Sam's business and looking after the welfare of 110,000,000 people is not a task for the man with the small-town mind, the corner-grocery vision and the cracker-barrel outlook and philosophy. Monkeyshines and jaw fests are utterly unworthy of a great legislative body, they deceive nobody and lead us nowhere. James Bryce, in his great work, "The American Commonwealth," remarks that there is as much difference between Republican and Democrat as between tweedledum and tweedledee, each being ready on nearly all occasions to subordinate national to party issues in order to retain office.

We do not want a non-partizan Congress for it is only in the friction of ideas in the crucible of contending thought that the pure diamond of a worth-while idea is produced, but there is a vast difference between party riots and constructive debate. We do not want the nation to drift into anarchy while contending political parties act like drunken fish wives. We are confronted with problems bigger than we have ever been called on to solve and the man who would step aside in this hour of crisis to grind his party axe, to pander to the insidious lure of hyphenism, is a traitor. It is this foolery that has made hyphenism spread like a cancer. As a matter of fact, the hyphen is now dispensed with and the mask discarded, and our foreign boarders stand before us today in their true colors, and their only use for the Stars and Stripes is to replace it with a flag more to their liking. We are aiding and abetting those who plan to enslave us, for remember this eternal, internal racial struggle will go on with ever-increasing violence unless our lawmakers get an entirely new point of view, take their tasks seriously, work constructively, and fight those destructive forces which mean national annihilation.

Soon you will have an election, and though I have hit the old parties pretty hard, I warn you not to fool with any of the new political sideshows that have sprung up and are bidding for your votes, for if you do it will only be a case of jumping out of a nice, warm frying pan into an all-devouring fire. We need a new outlook on life and especially a new political outlook, a new social policy. Instead of wasting our time in fighting, we should get together and work for a brighter and better day and develop, as Roger Babson well says, "those good motives of love, sympathy, hope and inspiration on which the industrial salvation of the world depends." We need more religion of the right kind, more churches and fewer movies. But all our religion will be in vain if it is cursed with a taint of rabid sectarianism and is not absolutely free from the defiling hand of "spiritual" politicians. The only religion that will help us, and which should be taught in every home and school in the land, is summed up in these few words of the Master: "Love your neighbor as yourself. Do unto others as you would have them do unto you." Popes, bishops, priests, ministers, preachers, may drool out their spiritual bromides until the crack of doom but until you are ready to accept and apply the basic principles of Christ's teaching to your everyday living, war, hate, suspicion and hell will be with us until the end of time. The Interallied Church movement, drawing the churches together; a League of Nations, drawing the peoples of the earth together; the re-writing of histories, eliminating lies and drawing the golden threads of truth together—these are all steps in the right direction, steps which lead toward peace, unity, fraternity, the brotherhood of man and the Fatherhood of God. In these last few words are summed up the essence of my fifty-seventh birthday message to you. That notable event occurs on the 25th of September, and I shall be ever so glad to hear from all of you, especially those who are striving to make this world a better place to live in, to make our land a hundred per cent American and worthy of the God who created it and of those who gave us a noble heritage, of which, alas, at present we make such little use. God bless and keep you all.

Don't forget that Uncle Charlie's four wonderful books may still be had. Start in at once to obtain them—they cost you no money, only a very little time and effort—and keep at it until you have the entire set. The book of Poems is beautifully bound in ribbed silk stiff covers; the Story Book is bound in two styles, the one in ribbed silk stiff covers like the Poems, the other in paper covers; the Song Book is bound only in heavy paper covers, and the Picture Book in handsome stiff covers. Poems or the Story Book in ribbed silk covers, either one for a club of three subscriptions; the Song Book or the Story Book in handsome paper covers or the Picture Book in pretty stiff covers for a club of only two subscriptions. These four books are a library of endless joy and merriment, the best medicine to drive away the blues and the best gifts in the world.

My Picture Book, too, has started a deluge of inquiries: Is Billy the Goat my daughter? Is Maria her ma? Is there an Aunt Charlie? Is the big boy in the Picture Book my only baby? I have had a little leaflet specially printed answering all these questions fully, and those who are interested will find the same in every copy of the four Uncle Charlie books sent out this season.

Now for the letters.

TEXARKANA, 1102 Sylvan St., TEX.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

Will you please give me some information on thrift to be used in essay work? Thrift as applied to the individual and the nation, and just a few points on keeping up with the Jones's. MRS. HENRY SCHULTZ.

It would take a dozen editions of COMFORT to cover the subject of thrift and its various ramifications. If you will look up the subjects of thrift and economy in the quotation works in your public library—the biggest one of all, by the way, has my name on it—you will find all that the great men of the world have said on this subject; and will get material enough for a dozen essays. Thrift implies self-denial, and self-denial (twin brother to self-control) is one of the great cornerstones of character building. A man without character is like a ship without keel or rudder. He cannot be trusted, he is usually untruthful, without honor and often without decency. The whole trouble with the world today is that the thriftless and shiftless, the lazy, the ignorant, the stupid, the vicious, the criminal, are planning to make a determined assault on those who have character and have lived within their means, who have put something by for a day of need. The shifty have declared war on the thrifty. There is a vast difference between thrift and miserliness. I admire the former and abominate the latter. Youth wants to spend recklessly, thinking that age and need will never come. There is no real happiness where there is no thrift. The man who has saved a few hundred or a few thousand dollars, as the case may be, is in the position of the man in the Bible parable who built his house on a rock and the winds and the waves beat against it in vain, while the shiftless and money-burners run up their frail shacks on the shifting sands of extravagance and soon are homeless. It was thus in Christ's day, and it is the same now. The thriftless man, however, never even builds a house on the sands. He walks through cities full of wonderful buildings, goes into museums filled with works of art, gazes on miles and miles of beautiful homes, and instead of wondering how all this was done, cusses the people who did it (and most of them accomplished it by self-denial). They worked for their money and then they learned the secret of making their money work for them. The Germans and the French are thrifty, so are the Scotch. The English, Irish and most Americans are spenders; so, while the American breathes his last in the poorhouse, the thrifty immigrant spends his last days in a comfortable home. The American mortgages, swaps or sells his house to get a flivver, and the foreigner walks in and gets the house. The New Englander or Yank was taught thrift, as was the Scotchman, by the rocky soil, from which with infinite pains he drew his sustenance. But the old New England stock is nearly exhausted. It drifted West where nature produced with a prodigal hand, lost its old virtues and started to keep up with the Jones's. The Jones's are spendthrifts and jackasses, and those who attempt to keep up with them are as brainless and idiotic as the Jones's themselves. The war has placed upon our shoulders a terrific load of debt. Congress is the willful and wanton money-burner in the universe. We have no financial budget system such as other nations have, no up-to-date business methods of accounting. Any firm that ran its business as Congress runs ours would go broke in a week. Every child should be taught something of finance, something of the value of money, taught what the public debt is, especially now that it has grown to such an extent that it may crush every one of us. We are mortgaging the future, leaving nothing for unborn generations who will curse us for our foolishness. In ten years there will be no newspapers or magazines. Our forests will have vanished. Remember, it is the thrifty people who are the builders of the nation and who sustain it. The man who had a million-a-year income during the war had to hand over three quarters of a million of it to the tax collector. What did he do with the balance of his money? In the vast majority of cases, he only spent a few thousand dollars of it; the balance was invested in Liberty Loans, in railroad stock, mining stock or other industrial securities. It is the dollars of the thrifty, especially the dollars of the man of big wealth (for those who are keeping up with the Jones's generally scatter their money on useless things that do not count and detract from, rather than add to, our national wealth), that develop our industries, build our railroads, the steel over which the cars glide and the luxurious cars in which you sleep, eat, recline and gaze at this wonderful America. Economy is the savings bank into which men drop pennies and get dollars in return. Franklin said: "Beware of little expenses, a small leak will sink a great ship." Spurgeon said: "Economy is half the battle of life, it is not so hard to earn money as to spend it well." Franklin also said: "If you know how to spend less than you get, you have the philosopher's stone." Men, for hundreds, nay, thousands of years, have recognized the value of thrift. It was Confucius, the great Chinese philosopher and teacher, who, before Christ, said: "The injury of prodigality leads to this, that he who will not economize will have to agonize." How wonderful and how true. As you travel through life, live by the way, but live within your income.

NORTON, N. C.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I have so much to make me happy—a dear father and mother, two sisters aged seventeen and fourteen. My father is a carpenter, but we live on a farm of 85 acres. I am twelve years old, five feet tall, with fair complexion and light grey eyes and wear my hair bobbed style. Of course, Uncle, you know all about the styles, don't you? I am studing fifth grade. I dearly love my books. Our school closes in January. Little brother and I had our adnoids and enlarged tonsils removed in November when the State Clinic came to our nearest town. We also had our teeth filled when the State dentist visited our school. My two sisters,

IN THE OLD GARDEN.

NEIL stumbled down step after step into the fearful darkness. Not a ray of light pierced the gloom which, for all Neil knew, hid desperate foes lying in wait to destroy him. The closing of the panel at the head of the secret stairs rendered his position more secure, inasmuch as his form was not thrown out for a target against a background of light. He heard a light footfall behind him, and imagined that Irma was following.

"Go back!" he whispered. "You must not endanger your life by coming here!"

She made no response, but he could hear her still descending. At last Neil reached the foot of the stairs and moved gropingly across a level place. His hands encountered something, and he paused, his heart in his throat.

His fingers had rested on warm, pulsing flesh; they entangled themselves in disordered tresses, fine and soft as silk; they encountered a chair and ropes and a bandage knotted about the lower part of some one's face. Heedless of danger, he struck a match with trembling fingers.

"Tonita!" he gasped.

The light struck sparks from the great black eyes of the Mexicana; she tried to speak, but only incoherent sounds came from behind the bandage.

"Who is it?" asked Irma, coming to his side.

He had dropped the flickering match and was busy with the cloth that covered Tonita's lips.

"Oh, what vile treachery is here!" groaned Neil, as he worked. "It is Tonita, my darling's truest friend!"

"Senor Preston!" cried the Mexicana, the moment she could speak, "lose not an instant. Beryl is in awful danger! Descend the next flight of steps—follow Berdyne, who is carrying her away! Oh, hurry, hurry! Do not stop to release me!"

Neil did not pause to question, but leaving Irma to undo the cords that bound the girl to the chair, he groped his way forward to the top of a second flight, then stumbled down and down, his heart beating fiercely and his brain on fire with anxiety. Once more he reached a level space, with a blank wall in front of him. To his right, his groping hands assured him that the way was open. Ah, the secret stairs led to an underground passage and his passage trended away from the house! Now he was beginning to understand how it was that Berdyne and Marm Kinney had vanished so mysteriously.

On and on he stumbled until, finally, he saw a ray of light far in the distance. Here, at the end of the passage, he came to another stairway, leading up. He heard low voices, too, as of men in wary and intensely earnest conversation. Slowly he crept up the stairs, straining his ears to listen.

"We must get to that launch now, without a moment's delay, and cross the bay to Sausalito. It is our only hope!"

"We can't take the gal! How in blazes are we goin' to get her through the town an' to the water-front? It isn't possible, noways!"

The first was the voice of Berdyne; the second, of Gorsline. Neil recognized them instantly. Carefully he lifted head and shoulders through the opening at the head of the stairway, and found that he was emerging from the tunnel into a sort of crude pavilion or summerhouse. All about him was a dense tangle of trees and shrubbery. Plainly the pavilion was the center of an old garden, long since abandoned.

Beyond the pavilion Neil saw the forms of Berdyne and his confederate; and beyond them—ah, the sharp pang that shot to his heart!—was Hargreaves, clinging to the despairing form of Beryl. The valet held the poor girl in a grip of steel, preventing outcry by smothering the little mouth with one of his hands.

The sight was more than Neil could bear. With a cry of wild fury, he leaped out into the summerhouse and stood face to face with the astounded Berdyne.

"Preston!" gasped Berdyne, falling back.

"By the Eternal," gritted Gorsline, "my chance has come!"

The latter drew a revolver and quickly raised it.

"Not that, not that!" warned Berdyne. "The noise will draw the officers! Finish the work, and be quick!"

"Courage, my darling, courage!" cried Neil, as his helpless wife renewed her struggles and attempted to cry out.

"Ah, what a meeting for those two devoted lovers, after the many trials they had undergone! Poor Beryl, unable to move a hand for her dear one's defence, was compelled to lie where she was and witness the tragic scene which was quickly enacted. She could not turn her head, or close her eyes; a horrid fascination held her gaze upon the fearsome spectacle.

She saw Neil turn, and, with a terrible blow, knock the revolver from Gorsline's hand.

"I'll have your life, my buck!" exclaimed Gorsline, his face writhing with passion. "Trenwyck ain't here to keep me from doin' what I will with you!"

"Scoundrel!" cried Neil.

Then they met in a deadly embrace, as once before in that house on Sutter Street. Now, however, Gorsline had no knife. And love is stronger than hate. Neil was fighting for his darling, and love endued him with the strength of a giant.

The ruffian struggled with terrific fury, now and again giving utterance to fierce oaths. But he fought in vain. Neil overthrew him, bringing him down with a sickening impact upon the hard earth, and pinning him there with a grip of iron.

Then it was that Berdyne's moment had come. From a coat he had drawn a dagger, watching the progress of the clash between Neil and Gorsline the while with catlike eyes.

Beryl, observing Berdyne steal up behind her husband, fought with despairing hands to free herself from the clutch of Hargreaves. Oh, if she could only cry out a warning to Neil!

She saw, as in some horrible nightmare, Berdyne bend over, his eyes gleaming like the archfiend's, the shining dagger raised. For an instant the blade hung aloft, as though the sloe-black eyes of Berdyne were searching for a vital spot; then—then——

Sharp, incisively, a shot rang out, echoing around the old garden. Beryl saw Berdyne drop the knife, spring erect, throw both hands to his breast, then pitch headlong to the earth.

"He struck me!" came a passionate voice from the pavilion; "he would have killed me as mercilessly as he was about to slay you, Mr. Preston!"

Irma Lee stood in the summerhouse, pale as marble, her eyes glowing, a smoking pistol in her hand.

Hargreaves, dismayed and terrified, released Beryl and stood erect. The girl fluttered to her feet, trembling and with barely enough strength to stand. Neil, at the sound of the shot, had turned from Gorsline to see what had taken place. Gorsline, taking advantage of his opportunity, rolled away and sprang up.

Shouts were coming from the direction of the house, and there was a crashing of undergrowth which signaled the approach of the officers.

"Cut for it, Hargreaves!" yelled Gorsline. "If we make a get-away, we'll have to be lively! The cops are upon us, an' Berdyne's done fer!"

Like evil shadows, the two men darted away. Neil ran toward his darling Beryl.

"My wife, my heart's idol!" he cried. "At last, at last!"

She tottered into his arms, and their love, taking heed of naught else in that supreme moment, breathed its holy incense aloft in gratitude to the Giver of all good.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

REUNITED.

The captain of police, who had hurried out of the house on hearing the pistol shot, came at a run to the old garden, followed by three of his men. They found Berdyne desperately wounded. He was conscious, however, although unable to move. Everyone else, apart from Beryl and Neil, had vanished from the scene. Irma had disappeared from the pavilion, but another was just rising through the floor, mounting upward from the dark passageway beneath. It was Tonita.

"How did this happen, Mr. Preston?" inquired the captain, pointing to Berdyne.

"That man," returned Neil, "together with two other scoundrels, was here. They had my wife, and were debating how they would carry her off. I leaped out among them from the summerhouse, and two of the villains set upon me. Berdyne, who is lying there on the ground, was about to plunge a knife into my back when he was shot by a woman who came upon the scene as I had done."

"A woman?" repeated the captain.

"The same woman," went on Neil, "who screamed while I was standing at the door—the one Berdyne tried to murder. But for her," added Neil, with deep feeling, "I should have been slain."

"But I don't understand," muttered the captain. "How did you get here? Where did you find your wife? And where were Berdyne and his confederates while we were in the house?"

"I discovered a secret panel leading to a stairway from a room on the second floor," answered Neil. "You were downstairs at the time, captain, and I feared there was no time to call you. The secret stairs led me downward two flights, and then into an underground corridor which ended under the pavilion there."

"Oh, ho!" cried the captain, "I am beginning to understand the secrets of Marm Kinney's opium joint. You have found your wife, so I suppose you are satisfied?"

"If that scoundrel yonder lives!" cried Neil, pointing to Berdyne, "I shall not be satisfied until he has paid the price of his evil actions to the uttermost."

"We'll take care of him, never fear," answered the captain. "Where are the men who, you say, were with him?"

"They took to their heels," said Neil, "and I doubt whether you will ever be able to overtake them."

"We'll try, at all events," answered the captain. "Come, lads!" he called, and with his men at his back he ran into the tangled bushes.

"My darling!" It was Tonita's soft voice, tremulous with joy at finding her dear friend alive and well and safely reunited with her husband.

"Tonita!" cried Beryl, and the girls flew into each other's arms.

Since the girls had entered the door of that fateful house they had each suffered keenly; their joy, therefore, at finding themselves free, and Beryl once more under the loving protection of her husband, can better be imagined than described.

Beryl told how Gorsline and Hargreaves had entered her prison chamber just after Irma Lee had reached the house, and had prevented the outcries she would otherwise have made; then she heard a door crash inward, and, a few minutes later, Berdyne rushed into the upper room and said that Neil had come and the house was surrounded by policemen.

Gorsline and Hargreaves hastened away to remove Tonita from the rear room into the secret passage, while Berdyne caught Beryl up in his arms and flew with her down the dark stairs, never dreaming that Beryl's shawl had been left behind to afford Neil a clue to his darling's whereabouts.

At the foot of the first flight, Berdyne was joined by Gorsline and Hargreaves, who had brought Tonita through a hidden door in the wall of the rear room. Hargreaves went on to help Berdyne take care of Beryl, while Gorsline lingered and attempted to slay Neil by flinging his knife at him.

Gorsline after the failure of his murderous attempt, had raced on after Hargreaves and Berdyne and their captive, to warn them that the secret passage had been discovered and that Preston might soon be upon them.

Gorsline was for instant flight, abandoning Beryl. The difficulties of conveying the captive girl across the city to the water-front, in broad day, were greater than the ruffian dared to face. But Berdyne would not listen to leaving the girl behind. While the two were discussing the matter, Neil came, reaching the old garden so quickly that the baffled plotters were astounded.

Tonita, in her turn, described what had happened to her, and how, directly after Neil had broken in the door, Gorsline and Hargreaves had rushed back to the rear room, lifted bodily the chair to which she was tied, and had carried her through the concealed door into the dark passage at the foot of the first flight of stairs. Neil and Irma came very soon, and, while Neil dashed on, Irma remained to remove the cords that bound Tonita's limbs. This work accomplished, Irma hastened after Neil.

Tonita's limbs were so cramped by the tight ropes that had been wound around them that for several minutes she was unable to stand. The sound of the pistol shot fired by Irma, however, had alarmed her and drawn her along the passage to the summerhouse. She did not know where Irma had gone; in fact, she had not seen her since she had finished untying the cords and had fled through the darkness in the direction taken by Neil.

Leaving the girls to talk and congratulate themselves over their escape from Marm Kinney's and the ruthless hands of Berdyne, Neil walked over to where the baffled villain was lying on the ground, groaning from the pain of his wound.

"Perhaps you think this is the end, Preston," said Berdyne, "but I swear to you it is not! If I live, you shall hear from me again!"

"If you live, Nicholas Berdyne," said Neil, with solemn intonation, "you will pass the rest of your life in stripes and behind prison bars."

"Not for this work! You won't drag the girl's name through the courts in order to send me up for what I tried to do with her."

"You speak truly there. Not a breath shall ever hover over my wife's name in any trial dealing with a case of this kind. You will be brought to book, Berdyne, for something else."

"For what?" Berdyne demanded, his face contorted with pain and his black eyes leveled upon Neil's face.

"For swindling Leroy Grayson's daughter out of a fortune!" said Neil sternly.

Berdyne shrank back in dire dismay. All along he had hoped against hope that Neil had not managed to secure the Grayson papers from the trunk. Now that hope was destroyed, and if he lived, and if the prison doors failed to close upon him, he would be ruined and penniless.

"When I reflect upon the vile treachery and the devilish arts you have used against a poor, friendless girl," Neil went on, his honest indignation showing in his handsome face, "I hardly know why it is I spare you, grievously wounded though you are. No punishment is too severe for a man of your vile character. Live, Nicholas Berdyne, and you will be a felon for life. I have the proof of your rascality, secured in Alaska months ago, and in San Francisco on the day of the earthquake, and I shall produce them in the Denver courts at the proper time."

With these words, Neil turned and went back to the girls. Just then the captain of police and his men returned from their pursuit of Gorsline and Hargreaves.

"The rogues have given us the slip, Mr. Preston," said the captain. "We have the worst man of the lot, however, and he shall be held safely until such time as you want him."

"Very good, captain!" said Neil. "You will hear from me later. Come, dearest," he added, to Beryl, "we will leave this place and go to some hotel where you and Tonita can rest after your terrible sufferings."

"And there is something else you must do for us, senor," said Tonita, with dancing eyes.

"What is that, Tonita?" asked Neil. "Send a telegram to your people saying that you are safe——"

HER TWO SUITORS

By Wenona Gilman

This strongly written story, which runs the entire gamut of modern life, from lowest to highest, is to be our next serial and will start in September COMFORT.

The heroine is introduced to the reader as a little, nameless, orphaned waif found in the wreck-strewn path of a cyclone, adopted by an animal trainer and reared to young womanhood in a circus tent.

Can you imagine a more unsuitable environment for a girl to grow up in?

It is a tale replete with wild adventure and thrilling episodes of the dangers she encountered and the temptations that beset her; telling of the snares set by those who plotted her ruin and how, braving the disdain of those who scorned her, she carved her own career.

But the crowning feature of interest is the romantic wooing of her by two suitors and the strange event that determined her choice.

Don't miss the interesting first installment of this story coming next month.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

LEROY GRAYSON'S NEMESIS.

To Circle City, in far-away Alaska, there came—some two years previous to the opening of this chronicle—a man who gave his name as Leroy Grayson. He was a middle-aged man, and gave his hailing place as Denver, in the States. In some way it became known that he had failed in business in Denver, through a dishonest partner, and had come to the land of gold to recoup his fortunes. Whenever a mail went out by Indian runner, or by dogs and sledge, Grayson was certain to send a letter to his daughter, about whom he was wont to speak often, and in endearing terms.

"My little Beryl shall live to be a lady," he declared. "I shall dig a fortune for her out of these icy hills, and come day I shall return to Denver and pour my gold at her feet."

That seemed to be the one desire of Leroy Grayson—to endure the bitterest hardships in order that he might make a fortune for his darling child. For months he worked on fruitlessly; then some one came into camp with the news that gold had been discovered in the bed of a remote creek. Grayson joined the stampede of men that started for the place, and staked off a claim of wonderful richness.

Into the camp, on this creek where the new strike was made, drifted Nicholas Berdyne, penniless and starving. He was likewise from Denver; and Grayson, who needed help in working his claim, took the man into his cabin, gave him work, and helped him in a hundred ways.

Berdyne coveted the claim, and his evil mind set itself at work to secure it from his unsuspecting friend. From a tribe of Indians he secured a slow poison whose deadly work confined itself to the brain. In artful ways he contrived it so that Grayson should partake of a certain amount of this poison each day. In the end, Berdyne's generous benefactor lost his reason.

A little later a party of capitalists came to the creek to buy up the claims. Berdyne showed a deed, purported to have been given him by Grayson, whereby the rich claim had passed into his—Berdyne's—hands. No one disputed the validity of the deed, and Berdyne received a draft for eight hundred thousand dollars for his right and title in the rich holdings.

Posing as a gold hunter who had "struck it rich" in the Northern fields, Berdyne returned to Denver a wealthy man. With him he brought Grayson, whose mind was a blank and whose body was but the shattered wreck of what it had once been. Thus the scheming scoundrel returned the father to his daughter; in a few months Grayson died, Beryl went to work in the bindery, and Berdyne began the enjoyment of his ill-gotten gains.

But the poor, wronged daughter had one friend who was not disposed to accept Berdyne's story. This was Neil Preston, who had become acquainted with the beautiful bindery girl and had given her his heart. Neil proposed that he should take a trip to Alaska in Beryl's interest, and find out whatever he could concerning her father. Beryl dreaded to have him go to a country where such evil had befallen her father, but he insisted, and so the two fond lovers parted.

What has already been stated, Neil discovered. He even found the man, one Mings, who had helped Berdyne secure the poison from the Indians, and who had forged the deed to Grayson's claim. Mings was desperately angry at Berdyne, as the latter had gone away without carrying out his written agreement to divide half the spoil with his confederate.

Mings had hitherto kept silent, fearing to involve himself in the net of the law; but, under the persuasion of Neil, he made an affidavit regarding Berdyne's actions, and told of certain papers in Berdyne's possession which would prove his guilt conclusively.

Neil went to Dawson City to see another man, who, Mings thought, could offer more damning testmony against Berdyne; and while in Dawson City Neil fell ill and was in the hospital for a long, long time. For months he had not heard from Beryl, and a vague feeling that all was not right filled his breast. As soon as he was well enough to leave the hospital, he returned by overland route to Skaguay, and thence, by the steamer Argonaut, to San Francisco.

Here his arrival was announced in the daily papers, and he was visited by Irma Lee, who told him a tale of persecution against his sweetheart which filled his soul with a mighty desire for vengeance. He arranged for the immediate marriage of himself and his sweetheart, and went to Sunset Ranch to get his little bride-elect.

All that Neil lacked to make a thorough case against Berdyne was the packet of papers mentioned by Mings. And we have already seen how providentially they came into Neil's hands. It seemed almost like the direct intervention of a higher Power seeking to undo the evil wrought by Berdyne, and carry to a success the unselfish struggles of Leroy Grayson for his daughter's welfare.

Berdyne, when he met Trenwyck in San Jose and started for Sunset Ranch, believed fully that he could beg or coerce Beryl into marrying him. This new step necessitated the destruction of every paper of an incriminating nature in his possession in the trunk left to the care of Hargreaves; and yet, at the same time, enough evidence must be saved to enable Berdyne to protect himself against Mings, if the latter should try to make trouble.

This explanation of Berdyne's reasons for bringing the trunk to San Francisco and leaving it there was pure speculation on Neil's part, yet it seemed logical and correct.

And so, to the two wondering girls Neil narrated the story of his discoveries in Alaska. Her horror at Berdyne's perfidy was equally divided with admiration for Neil's resourcefulness in carrying out the errand that had taken him to the distant North.

"And so, my darling," Neil finished, with a tender smile, "you see that you will soon be wealthy. At last the little bindery girl will take her rightful place among the society people of Denver."

"I am so glad, dearest," Beryl whispered; "you have given up your wealth and family for me, and you have won this fortune by your own courage and cleverness—so it belongs to you, even more than it does to me. I am happy to think that I can make up to you some of the things you have lost."

"I should be repaid far beyond my deserts, sweetheart," he fondly answered, "if I had only your dear self."

CHAPTER XXXIX.

CONCLUSION.

Joys, like misfortunes, never come singly. This was soon made manifest to brave, unselfish Tonita. Neil's telegram to her people that she was safe and in the hotel in Oakland brought a response in the person of Tonita's lover. He was in San Jose when the telegram was received, learned the joyful news, and at once took the train for Oakland. Thus the cup of Tonita's happiness was full to running over. But this was not all. Many young lovers who had passed through the terrible San Francisco disaster were being united in marriage, desirous of beginning life over again and facing the world hand in hand. The example appealed to Tonita's lover no less than to Tonita, and they also were made one at the altar.

The San Francisco fire burned for three days before it was checked. A week passed, and, when the various safes and vaults about the city were cool enough to be opened, the people began getting at their valuables. Near Van Ness Avenue a man was shot while seeking to plunder a safe among the ruins. This man was Dave Gorsline. Neil read to his wife the account of the shooting in a daily paper.

Marm Kinney, like Hargreaves and Trenwyck, vanished from the house in J Street about the time Berdyne was shot. They were never heard of afterward. Nor was any trace of Irma Lee ever discovered.

For a long time Berdyne lay in an Oakland hospital. Neil and Beryl went back to Denver; and Neil put Beryl's case in a lawyer's hands. In the course of a few weeks a gentleman of the legal fratrenity came on to Denver from Oakland, in Berdyne's interest.

Berdyne, the Oakland lawyer declared, was anxious to do what was right and just toward Beryl, and keep the case out of the courts. In case she would agree not to proceed against him, and would drop the entire matter, he would turn over to her the entire amount which he had received for her father's claim—eight hundred thousand dollars.

Under no circumstances would this offer have been accepted had not the lawyer declared that Berdyne had but a few years to live, and would be utterly helpless during those years. The bullet fired by Irma had shattered his nervous system, leaving him powerless to move hand or foot.

In the sight of Heaven, Berdyne was as guilty of Leroy Grayson's death as though he had struck a sudden and fatal blow with his own hand; and it went against Neil's better judgment to spare him. But his remaining years would be years of physical and mental torture, and it was Beryl's opinion that his punishment was heavy enough.

So it became known throughout Denver that Beryl, the bindery girl, had come into a fortune. She at once became one of the social leaders, and was courted and petted by all the wealthy people of Colorado's metropolis.

One Example of 1001 Styles in My Free $100,000 Style Book

Regardless of price, you will find no shoes anywhere that are smarter or more comfortable than I show here. But this is just one sample of all my other splendid values in suits, coats, dresses, and everything else that a woman wears. In other departments my styles are just as beautiful and my values just as unusual. So look around to your heart's content and see what others offer. All I ask is not to forget my new book.

Style, Price and Credit —Take Months to Pay

I allow you to pay just about as you please. You don't even need to ask for credit. I take care of all that in advance. You can have the loveliest things without waiting. You may look your prettiest at all times and take months to pay. You're enabled to have things early in the season and all your new things at one time.

But I realize that my Credit Plan alone wouldn't make many women want to have my new Style book. Style, quality and value must come first. The credit must be considered simply as something extra.

So I urge you to write for my Style book for the beautiful fashions it displays. Ask for it because I have given a lifetime study to producing good clothes at lowest costs. Learn how nice it is to get all your purchases delivered right into your home on approval, so that you can never make mistakes and never be disappointed either on quality, becomingness or style.

Your copy is waiting your request.

Be Posted on the New Styles

All my life I have had to know style tendencies way in advance of the season. In the old days I got to know the most famous designers everywhere. Now a great many of them come to me first with their new ideas.

So women everywhere look upon my Style book as a real authority. It will tell you the new width and length of skirts; the right height and design of shoes; the newest cloths; the latest weaves; the smartest trimmings.

You will learn from it the most popular modes in dresses; the fashionable colors; the correct ideas in millinery; lingerie or children's wear. Having it in your home is like chumming with a famous style authority. Why not write for it today?

Ask For It Early—

A Penny Postal Card Will Do

To get my free book all you have to do is to drop a postal card in the mails today. My Style book, with postage, costs me $1.00. But I want to send it to you free. You can make up your mind about buying from me later. But I want you to have my book early.

It is always a matter of pride with me to display all the most beautiful and practical styles, no matter who creates them or where they originate. My own designs have come to be the most widely copied of all fashions shown anywhere. But even this doesn't satisfy me unless I can produce such stunning things at a cost below what others charge.

Send for my book and see. It will tell you in advance of the season what styles will be most popular. It will help you to compare values. No matter where you finally buy, I want you to have it anyway. It costs you nothing.

The Secret of My Bargains

For many, many years I was a buyer of ladies' wearing apparel. I got to know mills and makers everywhere. I learned where to look for the very choicest bargains. In my own business I am able to apply all this experience and to make very wonderful savings.

I do away with all extravagances like fancy store space and high rents. I never have left over stocks or sacrifice sales. My book is my only salesman. I have no high priced salespeople. I deal direct with mills and makers and I buy in such big quantities that I get rock-bottom prices. I cut out all the profits of the retailer, wholesaler and jobber.

The biggest saving of all comes in this way: Nearly all dealers and stores charge for the appearance of a garment. It doesn't make any difference what it actually costs. If a style turns out unusually popular, an extra price is put on it. That is why there is so much false value in women's clothes. I never do this. The same small profit goes on everything—neither more nor less.

Everything a Woman Wears Sent Prepaid on Approval

I show 1001 styles in my latest Fall book. Any of them will be sent to you in just as easy and simple a manner as the shoes shown on this page. Your mere request and a trifling first payment is all I ask. Bear this in mind, this is not a C. O. D. offer or anything like that. Your selections are delivered right into your home for two days' free examination and I prepay all delivery charges. If you return your selections, I pay the cost back to me and immediately refund any payments you have made. Nothing could be more satisfactory or free from bother or red tape.

"I thought it was a Siwash Convention"

By Albert Sonnichsen

Copyright, 1920, by Albert Sonnichsen.

VARIOUS accounts of the facts concerned in the following narrative were published in the press, not only in Seattle and Tacoma, not far from where the incidents occurred, but all over the land, for the conception from which they originated was so unique, so strikingly clever in its very simplicity that it evolved finally into a huge joke at the expense of the Federal Revenue Officers. However, those printed accounts were rather a sequel to this narrative, for the persons involved did very little talking in court. It was not till some years later that I met one of the participants, third officer on a liner running between San Francisco and the Orient, and had from him the details which never had been made public.

"It was after my second trip to sea," he told me, "and I wasn't much more than a kid—just going on eighteen. Too old for a deck boy, which was all I'd been till then, and too young for an able seaman. Anyway, I couldn't get a ship in Seattle, and there I was stony broke, living in that hole, Copperbottom Ike's boarding house.

"Well, one day I ran up against Tim Buckley, whom I had known as a man before the mast on my first trip, a young fellow, but a good deal older than I was. I hardly knew him, so dressed up he was and prosperous looking. We shook hands, then he invited me into a saloon to have a drink, and I told him my hard luck story, though I wasn't specially thinking he could help me. I know there are some fellows who put all their pay on their backs and go short on grub to make up for the show.

"But Tim showed me right away that he wasn't that kind. Out he pulls a big wad of greenbacks that fairly made my eyes bulge, and offers me a twenty. I was so surprised that I didn't take it at once, and then Tim kind o' lowers his hand and says:

"Take it kid, unless—you'd like to go with me to where this stuff comes from. There's an opening for a husky lad about your size."

"Give me the opening," says I; "take me to it."

"Well, he took me to his hotel, and introduced me to two friends of his; an old fellow by the name of Selby, who seemed to have been more of a fisherman; and an Indian, Silent Jim, they called him, who had never been a seaman, as I could see at first look.

"Late that night the four of us went down to the docks, and got into a small sloop, and set sail up the Sound.

"It's a long sail," says Tim, "so you can turn in." So I turned in on a pile of fish nets down in the cabin and slept.

When I awoke next morning, we were heading into a sheltered cove, and half an hour later we ran up alongside of a jetty. Back from the shore, about a quarter of a mile, was a farmhouse. Along the shore was a lot of Siwash shacks, and behind them rows of trays on which fish were drying, so I thought that they were getting me in the fish business. But that was all a bluff, as you'll soon see.

"For three or four days we four men lounged about that farmhouse, not doing much of anything, old man Selby's wife and a Siwash squaw cooking for us. Of course, I'd been asking for explanations, but all I could get out of any of them was: "You just wait until you see what you'll see."

"I guess it was the fourth night, and I had turned in in my room when Tim comes and rousts me out.

"Come on," says he; "the Immigration Bureau has opened for business."

"So I got up and dressed, and he takes me out the back way, through a stretch of woods, and we come to a big barn. It looked all dark, and I was getting puzzled, when suddenly the door opens, and I see a big crowd of men inside, and the place all lit up, only there was canvas across the windows.

"At first glance, I thought I'd gone into a Siwash convention; there were about twenty Indians all about us, until I looks across the room and sees another bunch of Chinamen. And right in the middle of the floor was a barber's chair. A Chinaman got into it, another Chinaman got busy, put a wig over his head, gave his face a wash with a sponge, and the next minute that Chinaman got out and you couldn't have told him from a Siwash. And then I sized up the whole situation: We were on the British side of the Sound, and these chinks were to be shipped across.

"About half an hour later, when all the chinks had been siwashed, we marches down to the boat landing. I tell you, they had it all worked out slick. The disguised Chinamen were divided into lots of ten each, and one of us white men was attached to each lot before we left that barn: it was like being corporal in an army. But that Indian, Silent Jim, who could talk English like you and me, he was the general of the outfit. He'd worked out this whole scheme. Only he was a real Sioux, and no Siwash.

"There were thirty-four of us all told, and how we all squeezed into that sloop was a surprise to me. The Chinamen were shoved down into the cabin, packed in like sardines, then covered over with nets and fishing gear of all kinds. And when we were all ready to sail, a very slick looking Chinaman in white man's clothes and gold-rimmed spectacles counts out more gold eagles into Silent Jim's hand than I'd ever seen in my life; right there on the landing.

"Well, the excitement of the thing got into my blood, and I was beginning to enjoy it. It was a fine fall night, with a new moon that didn't give much light. The wind was west, blowing in sound and fair for heading directly across for the American shore. Selby steered, and Jim kept a sharp lookout. However, nothing happened; we could see the lights of steamers way off that might have been revenue cutters, but they didn't head our way, and about an hour before dawn we ran into an inlet and alongside a boat landing. Then we rushes the Chinamen out of the cabin and ashore.

"I could see about a dozen shacks near where we were and two or three Siwashes coming down to meet us.

"'Now,' says Jim to me, 'take your ten men into those shacks. This old fellow here will arrange the details where to put them. But when daylight comes, you see that they're all put to work. The old fellow will show you, but you keep your eyes skinned, so you'll know what to do next time. And if any white men come snooping around here during the day, you hand them out the right kind of a bluff. You're here fishing and hunting—shove them off the scene.'

"With that Jim and Selby leaves me, each going in a different direction with their squads of Chinks. and Tim casts loose and sails back across the Sound.

"The old Siwash, who could speak some English, puts my Chinamen away in different shacks, and points out to a place on a heap of gear where I could sleep. And pretty soon I was pounding my ear at a thirty-knot gait, for the excitement had tired me out.

At noon an old squaw woke me and called me out to eat. I looked around for my squad, thinking I had been caught napping, but I couldn't locate them anywhere specially. All I saw was half-a-dozen Siwashes here and there; two were mending nets, one was scraping the bottom of a canoe, another was down the beach digging for clams, and two were sleeping in the sun. So I guessed the old fellow had looked after my job. He came along pretty soon, nodded his head, and said: 'Heap all right, John—you go slip,' so after I'd fed on some boiled beans and coffee I went to sleep again.

"Well, suddenly I was awakened again. There was the old chap.

"'Quick!' says he; 'you go spik white man. Me plenty drunk.'

"Whereupon he rolls over and shuts his eyes, Up I jumps and walks out of the shack.

"And there was five men on horseback riding along the beach toward me. All were armed with Winchesters, so I guessed it was up to me to keep an open eye for squalls.

"The leader rides up leisurely, then reins in.

"'Hello, stranger,' says he. 'Been fishin'?'

"'Yep,' says I, stretching and yawning.

"'Ain't seen a dark-complected colored man pass this way, have ye? We're lookin' for one.' And so we kept chinning right along for ten minutes or so, but all the time I could see his eyes taking everything in. Finally, he gets off his horse, saying he wants to stretch his legs, and walks into the shack. But there wasn't nothing there but the old fellow, snoring to beat the band. And finally this boss constable mounts and the five of them rides off.

"Quick! Go spik white man"

"Naturally, I slept no more that day; I'd had quite a scare. Just about dusk Jim and Selby came with their men, and we had more beans and coffee. I told Jim what had happened but all he said was: 'Uh! Guess they'll be on our trail tonight.'

"About an hour after dark we set out, Jim in the lead, Selby next, and me last. We traveled about two hours at a pretty brisk walk, through heavy timber, along narrow, twisting trails. Pretty soon we came to open country and Jim called a halt.

"'Now listen,' says he. 'I go way ahead. One whistle, one hoot, one dog bark, means lay low—drop off the side of the road. Two whistles or hoots means come on. Sabe?'

"On he goes about a hundred yards ahead, we following. Then we struck a wagon road through a marshy country.

"I guess we'd been traveling an hour when suddenly I catches a low whistle. I turned to my Chinks, but those fellows had all been coached; they just dropped and rolled off into the dry grass. And so did I.

"Pretty soon I hears horses tramping, and a voice shouts: 'Hello, who's this?'

"'Me Siwash—go fish—Duck Creek,' came Jim's voice. Somebody lit a match, and I could see three men on horseback.

"'All right, John,' comes a voice. 'Ye ain't seen nobody coming along this road, eh? Have a drink of whiskey?'

"I could hear Jim grunt, just the way a Siwash says no or yes. And then, with a laugh the three men galloped past us down the road. We waited about ten minutes, then came two short owl hoots, the Chinamen tumbled out on the road, and we went on.

Toward morning we got into the foothills and came to a ranch. The fields around the ranchhouse were covered with haystacks, and into each of these stacks we put two or three Chinamen, while Jim, Selby and I went up to the house and had breakfast with the owner, a fellow by the name of Evans, his wife, and their two sons, all of whom seemed to be in the game.

"We slept there that day till late in the afternoon, when we had another feed, then Selby and I walk into a nearby town, where we take a train for Seattle. Jim, I guess, came by another train. Anyway, we met him in Seattle, and the whole lot of us went back to the farm on the British shore in the sloop, which had been sailed to Seattle by Tim. That trip brought me in over two hundred dollars as my share of the returns. And for over a year I worked the game for all it was worth, making nearly five thousand dollars, until finally they got us in the end. But that was all in the papers."

"But how were you discovered? I don't remember," I asked.

"What do you think? There was a woman detective on our trail for six months. And she spotted us at last. She came into the Siwash village when we had our Chinks there, looked them over as she had done several times before. And then a hairpin drops from the back hair of one of the Siwashed Chinks. Dropped from his coiled-up queue under the wig, I guess, and that little lady sizes up the situation at once, because no Siwash ever uses hairpins. So I got six months in a Federal penitentiary, all because of a hairpin. Ain't that ——!"

Comfort's League of Cousins

Thelma and Edith, went to Johns Hopkins Hospital two years ago and had their large adnoids removed. They were there about one month and they say it sure is a nice place.

Your niece, RUBY ESSIE COLLINS.

Three cheers for North Carolina, the most American State, by the way, in the Union as it contains only one per cent of individuals of foreign birth. No wandering "Presidents" of republics real or imaginary have a ghost of a show of causing international trouble in the Tar Heel State. Some people gauge Americanism on the basis of industrial prosperity (a dangerous delusion); but if you examine the war records of the American Protective League you will find that North Carolina was the most loyal state in the Union. Treasonable propaganda could not spread its poison there. Would all other States had as good a record. Yes, Ruby, I know all about the latest styles and before me is an article from a newspaper in scare headlines: "Girls To Wear Less This Year." Well, if they wear any less than they are doing now, Mother Eve will be outclassed and the police will have to chase them with horse blankets. Ruby, I am delighted to see that North Carolina is doing one of the main things that prompted me to plead for universal military training, which will eventually lead to universal good health. The State dentist is filling up the holes in the boys' and girls' teeth, something absolutely necessary to health, but why, with plenty of cake around, you boys and girls did not fill them up yourselves, I can't imagine. Billy the Goat says it was too much cake and improper diet that caused the holes. Wise Guy, Billy! I'm glad you've had those troublesome inflictions, "adnoids," as you write them or "adenoids" as they should be, and enlarged tonsils, removed. But I don't see why you called in the State Clinic surgeon to do the job when you had a carpenter in the house. A saw and a chisel ought to make any self-respecting adenoid throw up its hands and beat it. I would like to have my tonsils removed, but the furniture moving man says it would require two vans to remove them and he would have to make two trips at a thousand dollars apiece, and it would cost five hundred dollars a month for storage after he got my internal furniture stowed away. So I guess I'll let them stay where they are and send them a monthly bill for rent. Johns Hopkins is the finest institution of its kind in the U. S., and if you can get out of it alive you can always look back to your sojourn there with pleasure. But if I had a carpenter in the family, Ruby, no hospital would catch me.

WHITE EARTH, N. DAK.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am a girl twelve years of age, five feet six inches tall. Not many girls of my age are as tall as that, are they? Uncle, don't you think that young people should get togather at least once a month? I do. I do not mean to have dances, play kissing games and that other dope, but I mean such games as "Happy is the Miller, "Pig in the Parlor," "Four in the Boat," and so on. What do you think about this? It is not very densely populated here. If there is not room in COMFORT for my letter please write me a letter.

ETTA IONE MONK.

Etta, you are some girl, and I like the tone of your letter immensely. If your brain is only expanding in proportion to your physique, in a dozen years you will be the ruler of the universe. You will be able to tweak the nose of the man in the moon, skim the cream from the milky way, and, oh, every old thing. Yes, I do think young people should all get both together and togather. As we are short of farm help, it is far more necessary that they get to gather than get together, especially around harvest time. If there is anything to be done in the gathering line, Mr. Townley can doubtless give you all the pointers you need. I'm glad you are going to cut out the kissing games. Exchanging germs is dangerous. One has to take a chance when one grows up, but if you knew the danger that lurks in most mouths you would not want to touch the lips that shield them, no matter how thoroughly some of them were sterilized. Any way, Etta, thanks to your height, you are out of the kissing zone, or soon will be. Many a six-foot man has broken his back trying to kiss a four-foot girl, but those were in the days when they knew nothing about stepladders or air flivvers. The games you have suggested ought to afford an immense amount of amusement. Be careful, however, how you play that game, "Four in a Boat," for some boats won't hold four and not even one if the occupants are built along your Junoesque lines. You never know when a German sub (and there are plenty of them up in your vicinity) might not come sailing in from the kitchen, shake its periscope in defiance, torpedo your frail craft and drown you all in the depths of the parlor rug. I tell you there are many forms of death that are unspeakably horrible, but nothing quite so awful as being drowned in a parlor rug. Take my advice and try one in a boat before venturing on a stormy voyage around the parlor table with four. If you play pig in the parlor, see that he does not get into the boat or you'll be upset sure, then bacon will be scarcer than ever and Mr. Gompers' sixty-one-dollar-a-week printers (they wanted seventy-five dollars a week, by the way) won't be able to get even a smell, let alone a slice. When Sam has got all he wants for his crowd, the rest of us will be in the poorhouse. The only time a pig looks nice in the parlor is when he is served in slices. In spite of this, however, the pig will nose in, no matter how he musses things up, and others have to clean up after him. Happy is the miller! He will be if you raise any wheat for him to grind and he gets his usual rakeoff after it is ground. Nobody, however, is happy who eats the miller's product after the miller has taken all the life-sustaining matter out of it. You would be able to put more vim into your games if you were eating the bread milled by a miller who produced only wholewheat flour, which is the perfect food. Animals starve to death on white flour and so do humans but they don't know it. Etta, some of the cousins will doubtless be glad to send you books containing descriptions of parlor games and I hope you won't get a crick in the back reaching down to grab them.

NEW ALBANY, 2302 Shelby St., IND.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am a Hoosier girl, five feet tall, have brown hair and eyes and fair complexion. I hope this finds you feeling fine and able to get after the traters. Keep it up Uncle, anybody that's a trater to our flag should not be allowed to live under it. I am a member of two other clubs beside the C. L. O. C. One is a humain club. Uncle, do you believe in fortune tellers? Uncle, when are things coming down? Tell me what you think of it. I have a button off a soldier's coat that run on the General Grant engine during the Civil War. Is there any primum on it? Do you like music? I just dearly love it. A brass band is the kind I like best. I'd rather listen to one of them than eat. I play the piano and violin. Won't write more as the Goat has already chewed a dozen of my letters.

Your niece, PEARL LEES, League No. 43023.

I'm not feeling very fine, Pearl, but fine enough to get after the traitors, or "traters" as you have it. If all the "traters" were taturs, what a wonderful food crop we would have and we could have all those taturs well mashed before we ate them. There will never be any scarcity of the traitor crop, the Reds will see to that. That "humain" club must be quite interesting. I suppose a humain club is a half-sister or mother-in-law to a humane club. I wish I could make the world into one vast humane club, but it is a tough task for nations do not like each other because they do not know or understand each other, and lack of understanding causes jealousy, suspicion, prejudice and hate. Anyway, we have only had one generation that could read and even begin to think (for people use their emotions and let their brains rust), and the beautiful art of being kind, which is all this sad world needs, has never been put into practice. Fortune tellers are a bunch of frauds and fakers. In this section of the country these gentry are put in jail. You ask when I think things are coming down. I've just read in the paper that in the fall skirts will be longer, though I don't believe it. If this report is correct, things will be coming down. A telephone wire man has been on our roof and he is now coming down, and so are large sections of our ceiling. I understand that when it stops raining, umbrellas will come down, and if the Reds get control you will see the Star Spangled Banner coming down and Mr. Hillquit or Mr. Berger or some of their friends will be hauling up the red flag. Once the red flag symbolized a common brotherhood. It appealed strongly to all men of ideals, including myself, but like all good things in this world, even from the cross of Christ down, these symbols of a sublime idealism have been seized by rascals to cover every form of villainy, vice, murder, bloodshed and plunder, hate and destruction. Everything that symbolizes the good, the beautiful and the spiritual should be rescued from those who contaminate and disgrace it. That is the work of forward-looking humanity, and it is a work that will be done. I can't tell if there is any "primum" on that button. If there is, I advise you to polish it and get the "primum" off. I hope that a young lady who belongs to so many clubs as you do is not going to part with what many would regard as a precious souvenir, though I may tell you frankly that if General Grant had seen anyone running on his engine, they would soon have had the buttons all shot off them. General Grant was a man who stood his ground and was not strong for traitors or runners. Oh, Pearl, something else is coming down. There is a brass band coming down the street, and it is making such an awful racket that we have had to close the windows. It is making just the kind of noise you love. The Goat says you mean the price of things coming down. Before the price of food comes down, more food must come up, and more can't come up until we have more food producers, and food producers just now, instead of working, are watching the movies in the cities and trying to get a drink of wood alcohol. The recent railroad strike ruined thousands of tons of food and forced up prices, and so the merry game goes on.

The Pretty Girls' Club

Conducted by Katherine Booth

To Freckle or Not to Freckle

NOW is the time of year when the little freckle makes its appearance, when tan and sunburn go about seeking whom they may attack, and when every girl in the broad United States cries: "Oh, how do you get rid of freckles?"

There is an old saying which I recommend to your consideration: "Prevention is better than cure." The way to get rid of freckles in the most effective manner is not to acquire them. Few skins can stand the hot summer sun unprotected without blossoming forth in freckles, or donning a coat of sunburn, and if you want neither of these attributes then be a little more careful about courting Old Sol.

A good recipe for getting sunburned is to don a middy blouse with sleeves above the elbow, and low neck, and go forth unhatted to play tennis or row in the sun. If you are at all capable of producing freckles, be sure they will come forth on this invitation, while unless you have a decidedly tough skin you may resign yourself at once to an aggravated case of sunburn.

However, there is nothing objectionable in a tanned skin—the aftermath of sunburn—and the pleasure of the outdoors is worth the penalty, in my opinion. But if you want to keep a lily-white skin, you cannot do it by this method.

Skin which is dry or skin which is wet with water burns easily. Skin which is oily does not. So that is the first thing you should keep in mind. To protect your skin which is to be subjected to the hot sun, coat it thickly with cold cream and gently massage it until it will hold no more. Then wipe the face with equal gentleness with a soft cloth, and powder it with a good face powder. If you are going on an automobiling trip, be sure that your face cream and powder box go with you—not any dinky little amount of either, but a generous supply. And when you stop for lunch or a rest, apply a little cold cream and wipe off the dust of the road thoroughly; then smear on the cream quickly again and wipe off the surplus, adding the powder as the final touch. In this way, you may come home from your outing without any sunburned skin to testify to your adventure.

But you can't wander around on the beach without a hat, or even stroll down to the post-office summer afternoons hatless, unless you want a sunburned nose or a freckle or two. If you don't like to wear a hat, then invest in a stunning parasol and carry that when you go promenading down the pretty streets of your town. A parasol is out of place on an outing, however, so here you must provide yourself with a big becoming hat; and if you don't want sunburned, tanned or freckled arms, then there is nothing for it but a long pair of silk gloves. You can protect the skin of the arms as you do that of the face, by rubbing in cold cream and powdering, but you must be sure to get all the surplus cream off or your gown will bear the marks.

If I were you, however, I wouldn't worry about the marks the sun leaves, except to prevent a bad and painful case of sunburn such as comes from an extended trip in a motor car without a top. Cold cream, as used above, will help in such case, and you must always remember never to put water on a sunburned face or one which is hot from being in the sun. The heat added to the water will almost blister the face. Use cold cream for such cleansing purposes.

Answers to Questions

LOUISE.—Do not scratch the scales which measles have left on your scalp. Get a medicine dropper at your drug store, and with olive oil anoint the scalp thoroughly. To do this, part the hair from brow to nape of neck, and run the medicine dropper along the part; then part again about half an inch away, and do the same, and so continue until the whole scalp has been oiled. This is not so untidy as pouring oil upon the scalp, which makes the hair very oily, too. Do your hair up in a towel at night to avoid soiling the bedlinen; then in the morning shampoo the hair with water in which you have sliced half a cake of white household soap, letting it thoroughly dissolve. If you have the courage, keep the scalp oiled two or three nights before your first shampoo; this will mean, however, that you will have to keep out of sight, for your hair will be oily and stringy. If the scales do not come away after an oiling and shampoo, then massage the scalp every night for a week or ten days with fingers dipped lightly in oil. To massage the scalp, slip the fingers under the loosened hair on each side of the head, and, holding the fingers firm, move the scalp back and forth on the skull; place the fingers in a new place and repeat, and continue until the whole scalp has been gone over in this manner. If the fingers are slightly oily at the tips, this will lubricate the scalp. Of course, you must make up your mind that when you brush your hair the next morning, the oil on your scalp will be spread over your hair, and you will not look as attractive as you would like—but we must get rid of those scales, mustn't we? About dressing your hair becomingly, I have said many times in these columns that girls of fifteen in fashionable families dress their hair very simply; parting in the middle, for instance, and rolling softly away from the face, then braiding in one long braid in the back.

THIS IS NO WAY TO AVOID FRECKLES OR SUNBURN.

A good way to do it is to part the hair from ear to ear across the top of the head; then part again from the forehead to the part you have just made. With one half of the front hair, experiment, drawing it down a little on the forehead, then rolling it back, pinning it in place as you do with invisible pins; do the same with the other half, then braid the ends of both sides in with the back hair.

E. A.—Arm exercise will reduce the bust. You need not fear their developing other parts of the body. Exercise not only develops muscle, but wears away excessive fat. Any of the arm exercises given in these columns will aid in reducing the bust. Perspiration also reduces flesh, so if you will cut a bandage of rubber cloth wide enough to go well above and below the bust, and long enough to wrap tightly about the body, then fasten it about the bust with strips of adhesive tape, this will help in reduction through causing perspiration. It is a rather uncomfortable form of treatment in hot weather, however. Are you not too fat elsewhere? If you are, then the answer lies in cutting out fat-building foods, such as sweet things, starches (potatoes, rice, white bread, macaroni, etc.) and fats, including gravies, much butter, etc.

ROCHESTER.—You are eating the wrong kinds of food, my dear. It is a simple manner to reduce, if you will eat only the foods which make muscle instead of those which make fat. When you are already too fat, you need to reduce the amount of food as well as the kind, until you have lost some of the fat. First, make up your mind that you will eat only at meals, three times a day; that you will not eat candy, cake, preserves or other sweet things. With those two resolutions, you are a long way on the road to keeping the fat from coming. The next thing you have to do is to settle on a diet which will not make more fat. Here is a good breakfast for you: Half a grapefruit, or an orange, a soft-boiled egg on thin, crisp toast without butter. For lunch you could eat some sliced tomatoes on lettuce with French dressing or with just vinegar, pepper and salt; and some other green vegetable, like string beans for instance, or spinach, or asparagus, or carrots. Only the tiniest bit of butter should be used in seasoning the hot vegetables. A baked apple barely sweetened will make a good dessert, or an apple which has not been cooked. For dinner, any lean meat, any green vegetable but no potatoes or rice or macaroni or white bread. For dessert you can have any fruit (fresh), including melon, but must not have any cream on the fruit and but the tiniest amount of sugar. Oranges are good for you, canteloupe, peaches, pears, etc., etc. Don't eat fat meats, gravies, preserves, cake, pie, sweetened puddings; don't drink milk or take cream on any food; eat scarcely any butter or sugar. Try this plan for a few weeks and you will be surprised at the difference. At the same time you should exercise to the point of fatigue so that you perspire with the exertion.

ANXIOUS C. P.—I should let the mole on my neck alone, as meddling with moles sometimes causes serious trouble. Where a mole is large and fleshy, sometimes tying a thread around the base tightly will cause it in time to shrivel up and drop off. You understand there will still be a mark left on the neck, however. If you use a thread, dip it in boiling water first, and do not touch with the fingers the part of the thread that goes about the wart. You can wind the thread about the wart several times, drawing it tight. The only safe way to remove moles is by the electric needle in the hands of a skilled operator. You say your hair is short, and does not grow. It is not getting nourishment enough. Pay attention to your whole body, for the health of the hair depends upon the body health. See that you eat regularly, chew your food thoroughly, drink plenty of water between meals, get the right amount of sleep, eight to ten hours, have fresh air in your room, and that your bowels move regularly once or twice a day. Exercise and water-drinking, with proper foods, will take care of the bowel habits. Then shampoo your hair once in three weeks carefully, being careful not to use strong soap, and to rinse the hair very thoroughly afterward. If you can use rain-water for the shampoo, so much the better. Every night, when you are ready for bed, let your hair down, part it from the forehead to the nape of the neck, then brush each half gently and with long strokes one hundred times. Do not brush back from the forehead, but from the part toward the ears. Sleep with your hair loose. See what I say to "Louise" about massaging the scalp. Massage your scalp for five or ten minutes every morning when you first get up. You are at an age when your body is undergoing changes and its building qualities are strongly taxed, so it is not strange that your hair is feeling the effects. What you must do, therefore, is to give your body plenty to build with. Drink milk, eat plenty of cereal foods—oatmeal, cracked wheat, or any of the ready-to-eat cereals, with cream and sugar—lots of bread and butter, potatoes, rice, bacon, meat, eggs, etc. Fried foods are not very good for you because they take so much longer to digest and therefore overwork your stomach. Meats are better when broiled or roasted and are more easily digested. For the same reason, pork and veal are not particularly good meats; lamb, beef, mutton are better. Chicken and other poultry are good, as is fish. Eggs are a wonderful food, but they should not be cooked hard. Three minutes to three and one-half minutes, is enough for a soft-cooked egg. Poaching an egg is a good way to prepare it, but see that it is soft. Scrambled eggs are good if quickly prepared and still soft and creamy. You couldn't have better food than the following: For breakfast, some fruit, such as an orange, an apple, a piece of melon or a dish of berries; then a big bowl of oatmeal and cream with sugar, and some toast or bread and butter; then a soft-boiled egg. For lunch, some rice with butter, a green vegetable, a glass of milk, bread and butter and plenty of it; and perhaps a baked apple. For supper, some meat, potato, bread and butter, a green vegetable, some baked custard, or some fresh fruit or any other simple dessert. When we are growing girls, we have little to say about what food will be served at a meal, which is only fair, as the older people are entitled to their preferences; but if you can get plenty of milk, soft-boiled egg for breakfast, cereal and cream, potatoes or rice, and lots of bread and butter, you will have good foods with which to build up health. This is a time of your life when you want to give yourself the right things to eat that you may be made into a healthy woman. Be sure to chew every mouthful of food until it is liquid before you swallow it; in that way you get out of it all the body-building qualities it has. Drink plenty of water between meals—eight to ten glasses a day. Oh, about that blackhead which has left a lump. That just means that the pore is still clogged with secretions. Do you take a good body bath every day when you are well, being careful that the water is warm and that you do not get chilled? That helps the skin to throw off its impurities. For the face, before you go to bed at night, use hot soapy water to wash the skin thoroughly, then rinse, then lay hot cloths over the nose where the blackhead lump still exists; this helps to open up the pores and let the impurities out. After you have done this for a few nights, however, and the lump has disappeared, stop using the hot water packs, or it will make large pores on your face.

HELEN.—Your freckles are of the summer variety. The best thing for you to do is merely to protect the skin as much as possible, in the future, in the spring when you begin to acquire them. Anything which removes freckles must take off the fine surface skin, for freckles lie beneath the skin; this renders the new skin susceptible to other blemishes and needing more protection than the old. The year is too far advanced, now, I presume, to ward off a crop of freckles for this year, but next year you should heed the advice I give in my talk to my "Pretty Girls" this month. In the meantime, if you want to use something on your freckles, lemon juice is the most harmless acid. Even horseradish, ground and made into a paste, then applied to the skin, will act. Another formula is as follows:

To Remove Freckles

Glycerine, one ounce; lactic acid, two ounces; rose-water, one half ounce. Dampen your freckles with this lotion. It will probably redden the skin, for what it must really do, as I have explained, is to remove the discolored skin which we call freckles. You can use a good cold cream afterward to soothe any irritation. My own advice would be, since your freckles are so insignificant, to powder them as you have been doing, not attempt to remove them, then another year begin early in the spring to ward off their reappearance. About the down on the upper lip, I do not advise the remedy you suggest; in fact, I strongly advise against it. You will merely have a new and stronger growth shortly, and then your troubles will begin in earnest. Try the peroxide and the ammonia, as I have recommended. The probability is that you do not need anything; if you will examine people's faces closely, you will find that the large majority have a down. This is not objectionable, and only becomes so when the down develops into hairs, if it does. You are a pretty girl and will stay so longer if you do not experiment with cosmetics, lotions, eradicators, etc. Just take care of the complexion you have, and think as little about it as possible. You would be surprised to see how few things the professional models use on their faces, and how careful they are not to "experiment" with their skins. I recommended a very simple treatment of the skin to a model once, and she said earnestly: "Oh, but I never use anything on my skin except a tiny bit of the very finest powder. I can't afford to experiment with it." That's a good thing for a "pretty girl" to remember.

ALABAMA GIRL.—Any arm exercise will help your bust. Deep breathing will increase your bust measure in a short time. Be careful how you stand. Do not let the shoulders fall forward, but drop them easily, then throw the chest out but without forcing the shoulders back. This easy elevation of the chest will give your lungs room to do their work and grow in capacity, and as this takes place, your bust will increase. To practice deep breathing, stand erect, with hands on hips or hanging loosely at side, then slowly draw in breath through the nose, keeping the mouth closed. It should take you at least ten counts to do this. Then just as slowly exhale the breath again through the nose, and while counting ten. Repeat ten or fifteen times, and do this several times a day. In fact, you can always practice deep breathing, as you go about your work, as you walk along the street. Be sure your corset is not too tight. Wear a low-busted corset, one that extends only a little bit above your waist, and the top of which is about an inch below your bust. Tie your corset strings in two places,—about half way below the waist, and again at the waist. Never put your corset on laced—but unlace it each time before you unhook the front. In putting it on, it should be unlaced with the strings very loose; the front should first be hooked up, then the side garters fastened to the stockings, and finally you should settle yourself easily into the corset, and draw the strings at the waist till the corset fits you easily, then tie the strings; then draw up the strings below the waist, and tie them firmly. To lace your corset for this method of putting it on, begin at the top, putting the middle of your corset string there, and then lace with each string until you reach the waist-line; then instead of crossing over, as you have been doing, put your left string which you have just drawn through an eyelet on the left side, into the hole just below it on the left side; at the same time putting your right string which you have just drawn through an eyelet on the right side, into the hole just below it on the right side. Leave a loop at this point on each side of the corset, then resume your lacing until you are about five inches below the waist-line, then do the same thing again, leaving a loop on each side, and finish lacing to the bottom. Wear rather a long corset. Use these loops to draw up the corset string when putting it on, and be sure your corset sets easily about the waist, and that you have not pushed the flesh at the waist-line down below the waist-line of the corset.

Whole Wheat Puffed to Bubbles

Puffed to eight times normal size. Grains airy and toasted, thin, flimsy and crisp—ready to crush at a touch. The most flavory, most fascinating morsels ever served in a bowl of milk.

Yet they are simply wheat grains steam exploded and made easy to digest.

Served Tonight

To Millions of Happy Children

Puffed Wheat is the finest dainty ever served in bowls of milk. The gigantic grains are thin and airy, and they floât. The flavor is like toasted nuts. The thin walls crumble at a touch.

The fragile grains seem tidbits, made solely to entice. But they supply whole-wheat nutrition. And with every food cell blasted, digestion is easy, quick and complete. Puffed Wheat in milk forms a supreme food in the ideal form, and every child should get it in abundance.

Grains That Melt Away

Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice are whole grains puffed to bubbles. Corn Puffs are corn hearts puffed—sweet toasted inner corn.

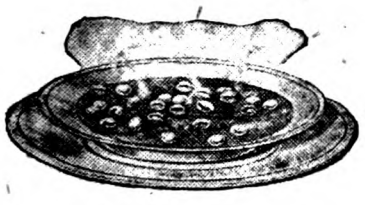
The process was invented by Prof. A. P. Anderson, and the purpose is to blast each food cell, to fit it to digest.

The grains are sealed in guns, then revolved for an hour in a fearful heat. The bit of moisture in each food cell is thus changed to steam.

When the guns are shot those cells explode. A hundred million steam explosions occur in every kernel. Thus these three Puffed Grains—Wheat, Rice and Corn—become the best-cooked cereals in existence.

Thinner than tissue

Puffed Grains are as airy as snowflakes. The walls are thinner than tissue. When crushed they melt away, and the flavor is exquisite.



Each has its own delights, so every home should keep the three Puffed Grains on hand.

They are not only breakfast dainties. Serve all day long, in all the ways you can. They will take the place of lesser foods, of sweets and of confections.

Thousands made candy with Puffed Rice in it, to make it light and nutty.

Wafers in soups

Thin, toasted wafers. Use the Puffed Grain which best fits th soup flavor.

Puffed Wheat Puffed Rice and Corn Puffs

Also Puffed Rice Pancake Flour

Now used in pancake flour

Now we mix ground Puffed Rice in an ideal pancake flour. The Puffed Rice flour adds a nutty taste and makes the pan-cakes fluffy. The flour is self-raising, so the batter is made in a moment. And you never knew such pan-cakes. Ask for Puffed Rice Pancake Flour.

The Quaker Oats Company

Sole Makers

This morning

Millions of others had some Puffed Grain served with cream and sugar. And it tasted like a food confection—like nut meats puffed.

With their berries

Others mixed Puffed Grains with berries and made a delightful blend. The flaky, flimsy globules added what crust adds to a shortcake.

This afternoon

Puffed Grains were crisped and doused with melted butter. And countless children, when at play, ate them dry like nut meats

At dinner today

The ice cream dish was garnished with Puffed Rice or Corn Puffs. And the flavory bubbles, melting into the cream, doubled its de-lights.

THE ELUSIVE CHECK

by Anna S. Ells

COMFORT readers will learn with sorrow that this is the last message we shall be able to print from the pen of this gifted author who wove her very soul into her inspiring romances, many of which have appeared from time to time in this magazine, several during the past year. Anna S. Ells joined the "great majority" about a year ago and we bought this story of her shortly before her death.—EDITOR.

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

THEY had been married six years when the terrible thing happened. In all that time they had been the best of companions; they had developed matrimonial curves instead of angles; they had learned to laugh where too many sigh; they had cultivated a leniency toward each other's failings that guaranteed happiness; in short, the "ourness" of the compact had not yet individualized.

In these six happy and contented years they had accumulated in the order named, a Boston pup, now a Boston dog of great dignity, a Persian kitten, now a Persian cat, a son named Gem, who joined gleefully the happy family assigned to him, a daughter named The Angel, who looked upon them all with sweet seriousness, and lastly, a house, which they straightway made into a home, and which was considered a delicious joke.

The upheaval came when Pedro (his real name was Peter) evoked from his innermost brain an idea, furbished it up on the sly, got it copied on the office typewriter, and forwarded it to a monthly justly famous; all without Rhoda's knowledge, you note, and with many an inward quake; and when, still in the secrecy of his office, he received a goodly check therefor. His heart bounded within him. Now his secret could be shared. Home he rushed and waved the long, thin slip aloft.

"Hurrah! The Fleece of Gold!" His joyous voice carried through the long hall to wifely ears. "Riches sweep down upon us. The winds of heaven waft them, the mails carry them, and upon you I bestow them."

Rhoda viewed the waving slip of paper with amusement; she was accustomed to her husband's extravagancies of speech.

"Is it an honest-to-goodness check?" she queried.

"It bears inspection," he retorted, laying it before her astonished eyes.

"I don't understand, Pedro. Did it come 'out of everywhere into here,' or is there reason in its madness?"

"Perfectly simple, like golf. Your loving husband has developed a brain as well as arms and legs. Grey matter did the trick, my dear, and it will do others."

"Elucidate."

"I wrote a tale of joy; it brought a check of gladness."

"Actually? You delightfully brilliant young man! Proud am I this day to own you. We will put it into the bank for a nest-egg," she decided joyously.

"We will have the time of our young lives," he declared.

"Oh, Pedro! It would be such a start for the babies."

"More checks where this hailed from. Don't you worry, little woman. We are going to live—live—live."

Rhoda caught the infection, and together they whirled down the hall, followed by two small imitators for whom the dance held no strangeness.

It was after Pedro had gone to his office the next morning that the terrible thing actually happened.

Returning from the last farewell at the porch, Rhoda paused to give the long, thin slip that meant so much, one triumphant wave over her head. The slippery thing slipped from her fingers. She turned to pick it up. It was not there. Smilingly she began the search; frantically she continued it. No long thin check greeted her wildly-searching eyes. She moved Pedro's big Sleepy Hollow; no check. Then every article in the room was examined and moved into the hall. Buffet drawers came out and were emptied, the rug shaken, the few pictures taken down and searched. No window was open and the doors had been closed. Up and down the bare room she paced. Had there ever been a check? Was she sane, or dreaming wildly? It was maddening; it was uncanny. A check was a tangible piece of paper; it could not disappear without going somewhere. The thing was impossible. She sank to the floor to hold her throbbing head and think—think.

Gem and The Angel had been "helping." Now they brought a little pile of fragments which they offered hopefully. Their mother was too distracted to even smile.

As the slow hours passed she continued the search, often in the most impossible places. She lifted the telephone receiver to pass the doleful news on to Pedro, but no——. It would be easier for both to wait until he came home. Perhaps the check would reappear as mysteriously as it had vanished.

All day she waited anxiously, even hopefully, for Pedro's return, but when his key sounded in the lock at the usual hour, she quivered a retreat, as though some sin rested on her soul.

"Hello the house!" came the beloved voice.

Rhoda's heart gave no answering thrill. It was the first time that voice had failed to ring a welcome. How could she break the spell of happiness that lay upon them?

Wee Gem solved the problem, as he rushed forward with outstretched arms.

"It's losted, Daddy! All losted, an' we hunted and hunted."

"What is 'losted,' little man?" Pedro lifted the boy to his shoulder. Something was often "losted" with Gem, and he gave the declaration no thought until he caught sight of his wife huddled in a chair encompassed by woe.

"Anything wrong, Rhoda?"

"It's the check. It's gone," came from the doleful depths.

"Gone! Where?" His amazement was boundless.

"If I only knew," she sobbed. "You said the—the 'winds wafted it.' They have taken it away."

For the first time her femininity annoyed him.

"Suppose you show a gleam of intelligence and explain." His voice held a note of sternness new to her.

The tale was soon told, there was so little to tell. He looked at her with strange gravity, and the look remained long after the tale was completed. A torturing moment passed, then——

"Do you expect me to believe that flimsy story? What did you do with the check?"

Rhoda's eyes opened wide; her cheeks flushed crimson. Gem and The Angel watched anxiously. For them the stars were falling.

"Pedro, have I ever told you an untruth? That is exactly what happened, so help me God."

It is said that a beast lurks in the soul of every man. Pedro's slipped his leash, and kindled a slow anger in a heart singularly pure and clean.

"When you are ready to explain, let me know," he answered grimly as he turned away.

Rhoda sank back with a groan.

Gem felt that there was need of a man in the house. He looked swiftly from one to the other, then rushed over to his father and struck at him with all the might of his small fists.

The Angel's lips quivered as she climbed into her mother's lap.

"You can fool them," Pedro sneered. "It don't work with me. I'll have dinner at the Club."

The banging of the front door sounded a funeral knell. It was so unlike the Pedro she had known.

"So that is the serpent I have cherished in my heart!" Rhoda sat erect, her eyes blazing.

Then began the second lesson of their married lives. It was as though other souls inhabited their bodies, and their lips gave utterance to thoughts not their own. The routine was the same, but enlivened by laughter. There were no noisy jubilees, no lingering farewells, no welcomes. Even Gem and The Angel played quietly, but there was an odd expectancy about them.

There were days when Rhoda searched all day for the missing check; nights when she awoke with the sure knowledge of its hiding place; days when she wept for the departed happiness, and days when justified anger burned hot within her.

Pedro, grim and unbending, was as unhappy as she. He knew in his heart of hearts that he was wrong, yet, in his masculine wisdom, he knew that she could not be right. Necromancy was a myth; a check was a tangible thing.

So each walked a weary way alone. The "ourness," their banner and their shield, was quite mislaid.

One night, some three months later, Pedro laid another check on the table by his plate.

"There is a second check," he announced, looking across at his wife. "There will be others. But we will have no 'wind-wafting' about this one. I'll take care of it myself."

Rhoda's eyes met his squarely. For the first time the beast of his own slunk back. For the first time his doubt of her was really shaken.

Her voice was low and tense.

"May God forgive you, Pedro. I cannot," she said.

Pedro knew then that the impossible was true. To his wife the disappearance of the check was as much a mystery as to himself.

That night when assured that she slept, Pedro descended the stairs, and searched the dining-room thoroughly, but he left it no wiser than before.

On his way to the office the next morning he saw a great bunch of yellow jonquils, for spring had come. At sight of their golden glory, the words "A Heart of Gold" leaped at him. They stayed with him all day, and he took them home with him at night. "A Heart of Gold!" Well he knew that a heart of gold beat true for him alone, and a tenderness stole into his own sore heart, but he banked his check that day.

After that little kindnesses detracted from the gloom of the long, spring days. A third lesson was added to their experiences. The joy of living was not in it, the "ourness" that blessed still was missing, that heart-to-heart front to all the world that is a breastplate against its buffetings. In its stead there grew a quiet half-contentment into which memory would prick and sting; a comfortable give-and-take in the ways of life, but the barrier lay between.

It was when the third check came that matters moved onward. It was somewhat larger than the others, and consequently of more importance. Pedro thought to wipe out the past with one touch of confidence. As they sat down to dinner he tossed the check across to his wife, trying to laugh carelessly as he exclaimed:

"Still they come! We shall make our fortune yet."

Rhoda looked at the check, then at Pedro, but she did not touch it. Her face in its sweet gravity was like that of The Angel.

Gem made a dash for the long, thin slip.

"It'll get losted. Put it in your pocket quick, Daddy."

No smile greeted his earnestness. The eyes of the husband and wife had met. For a long moment the silent battle waged, then Pedro arose, closed every door and window, picked up the check, and standing in front of the buffet as Rhoda had done, waved the check above his head, attempting a joyous abandon he did not feel. Once again Fate took a hand. The check slipped from his fingers. He turned to pick it up, but it was not there. Almost in fear he looked at his wife, but she was not watching. The Angel was clasped to her breast, and she was furtively wiping her eyes. Hope was stirring within her aching heart.

Madly Pedro began to search. With broken phrases he explained the new mystery. Rhoda joined him, but she had little hope that either check would ever come to light. Once Pedro paused long enough to snatch her to his breast.

"I've been a beast!" he asserted convincingly.

"You have," she assented, but there was a hint of hope in her low voice.

Over went the chairs; the buffet drawers came out; the table was dismantled, the rug away. Pedro was disheveled and excited; to Rhoda it was an old tale repeated.

At last Pedro sank into his Sleepy Hollow, a dazed expression on his face. His eyes still searched the room. As he met his wife's grave gaze, he flinched. She saw it and it hurt. To have the man you love show the white flag when he should be on the firing line is worse than masculine petulance. She waited for him to retrieve.

"Gad, Rhoda, if this is what you've been through all these months, I don't see how you've stood it." A pause, then—"and with a brute for a husband. I've—I've been angry at myself, I've been discouraged, even dismayed, but this is the first time I've ever downright despised myself."

He sat there huddled down, a picture of misery.

It is the woman in a woman that makes it possible for her to marry a man; it is the mother in her that makes it possible for her to continue that marriage in contentment and peace.

Rhoda knelt on the floor at Pedro's feet and laid her head on his knee.

"You said," came in dejected tones from above her, "that you could never forgive me; and you meant it, wife, you know you did."

"Yes, Pedro, I did mean it, and I am not sure that I ever can—quite. But it was hard for you to understand, and I guess faith is not part of a man's make-up."

His hand rested on her hair. There was a little catch in her voice as she continued.

"We will call this a milestone, Pedro, and start afresh. At least we will share the mystery now. Some times I have felt that I should go wild thinking about it. I like to grapple with worries; this always eludes."

The boy in the man flashed forth.

"George, girlie, let's hunt this room all over again."

But the days passed and the third check had vanished after the first.

Now came the fourth lesson. The glee was never the same as of yore, but joy came back, joy and faith and love, and the "ourness" that shielded and blessed. Gem reached the dignity of three-inch trousers, and The Angel beamed approval on these humans under her care.

It was furiously hot one evening in late July. Pedro and Rhoda sat fanning and discussing plans for their brief holiday after dinner. Gem had slipped from his chair, and was poking inquiring fingers into a rift between the top of the baseboard and the wall beneath one of the windows, in which occupation The Angel found it needful to join. A few moments later she ran to her mother with a wail; she had "hurted" her finger. While the mother soothed her, Pedro investigated his son's occupation.

"What are you up to, young man?" he called out. "Don't pull the house down. See here, Gem, stop that! You are tearing the wall paper."

He hastened over to stop devastation, but Gem was in deadly earnest; wall paper was a secondary consideration.

"I've got to dig it, daddy. I losted my flag, an' a penny——"

"Good heavens! Rhoda come here." Pedro's voice was momentous.

Together they bent over the long crack where the baseboard had warped away from the wall. There was visible a space perhaps one fourth of an inch wide by eight or ten long, narrowing to nothing at either end. Near the center of this opening the corner of a thin, pink paper peeped. Rhoda gave an astonished gasp; their eyes met.

"Can it be possible?" she whispered.

"That I do not know, but I intend to find out," announced Pedro, starting for his workshop in the basement. A few moments later he had pried the baseboard away sufficiently to reveal the treasure.

"Galconda," he ejaculated, straightening up.

Fortunately the spot was near the door into the kitchen. Pedro managed to loosen a door casement, then pry the baseboard far enough from the wall to allow Rhoda to insert her hand.

"Don't pull the house down!" worried Gem, but no one gave heed.

On the floor lay the little pile of treasure; the two long, thin checks, a toy flag, a penny, some stamps, and other bits long missed. Pedro made a little mound of them on the floor, while the babies watched wide-eyed.

"Kitties!" The Angel hopefully suggested, unnoticed.

"There, that is all, Rhoda, and enough I should say for one small crack. How a draft should ever have drawn them in there is more than I can see, but it evidently did."

Rhoda curved her hands widely over the little heap.

"And months of lost happiness, lost trust and faith. We can never get those back, Pedro, never."

Once again the mother in the wife spoke.

"There is no use sighing, Pedro; we will use the experience to dig deeper into happiness."

There was a world of love in Pedro's eyes as he looked up.

"Will you ever forgive me, wife? Can you do so big a thing as that?"

Rhoda hesitated. She gathered the little pile from the floor; gave the flag to The Angel, and the penny to Gem; carefully smoothed the thin checks, and placed them on the table, then faced Pedro who gravely waited.

"We all have a second self, my loved one, I realize that. If this stranger, so unlike the man I love, is conquered, we will forget him. If he comes again—oh, Pedro, I could not bear that."

Pedro paced the length of the room and the hall, then came as slowly back.

"He shall not come back, Rhoda, he shall not come back. I know his beastly tricks; I'll be on guard night and day hereafter."

For a moment he searched within his heart, then——

"Oh, my love, my wife!" His arms were waiting. "I cannot go limping through life alone. Come close to my heart; I need you so, oh, I need you so!"

Wife and mother, mother and wife; big of heart, tender, forgiving, loving and strong. "I need you so."

The light of the stars shone in Rhoda's eyes as she crept into her husband's arms content.

Thus was the cycle completed back to the first lesson of love, back to the life-line of faith, beyond which no love may venture in safety.

The City That Was Not

by Hapsburg Liebe

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

IT was sheer idle curiosity, perhaps, that sent young "Hondo Jim" Clarkson to St. Louis, Chicago, Buffalo, New York—sheer idle curiosity, aided by the big money his ranch had made for him during the past year. He had never been to any city before. But he had heard much of cities, and read much of them, and he wanted to see them for himself. His days, even his nights, had been filled with cattle, cattle, cattle, ever since his boyhood. He needed a rest, he thought, and he took it.

There is no doubt that it was Fate, granting that there is such an animal, that sent Hondo Jim to Mrs. Magill's Select Boarding-house, which held forth as a sort of hypothetical home to certain shoe clerks, bookkeepers and department-store girls.

It was after supper,—he called it that, though the rest of them called it dinner,—and Jim Clarkson sat alone in his upstairs room and deliberately took stock of things. The outcome was exceedingly disappointing. The cities made him feel too inconsequential. Back home, on the River Hondo, he had been a big frog in a little puddle. Here he wasn't a little frog in a big puddle; he wasn't even a tadpole! In a shooting-gallery, he had seen a pale and sickly-looking youth break one glass egg after another in the air with a small rifle, a feat that he, the pride of the Hondo as a marksman, would hardly have attempted; he didn't know that the rifle threw some two dozen tiny shot instead of a single bullet. In a theater he had seen a very small man, and a Jap at that, manhandle the strongest fellow the audience could produce; he didn't know it was jiu-jitsu, or that the victim had been bought off beforehand.

And there was something else. In certain shady quarters that he had blundered into, he had witnessed two marvels of gunfights, and he had seen a man slap a woman's face and then disappear as though by magic. Hondo Jim had gone to his hip for the gun that wasn't there——

"The savages," he said very soberly to himself, "sure don't live in the woods, deserts or plains. The savages live in the cities. I wonder just how long Wild Bill Hickok or Billy the Kid would ha' lasted here! Talk about bad men, them out West were pikers."

After staring at nothing for a moment, he went on: "And the cities is all alike. Every one. It's the River Hondo for me. I'm sure glad I didn't sell out a year ago, like I thought o' doin'. Now, the fellow that slapped that woman——"

Hondo Jim Clarkson was certainly no saint himself, and he didn't pretend to be one. His record was more or less checkered; and yet, it was all a clean checkering. The idea of a man striking a woman—it sickened him, made him ashamed of his sex. He rose, found that the night had fallen, and turned on a light. Just then the tinkling of a banjo came from the room next to his, and somehow it jarred. Clarkson was ordinarily a lover of any kind of music, but now—well, everything jarred now. He quite forgot that he wasn't back in New Mexico, where even the stars were his, and rapped on the wall.

"Break that off!" he said harshly.

The tinkling stopped so quickly that it surprised him. Almost, it made him regret that he had interrupted. He sat down again, and, oddly or not, began to think of the one person at Mrs. Magill's that had seemed really worth his notice; she was a slender, light-haired woman of not more than twenty, who had sat squarely across the table from him. She was quiet, good-mannered, and as pretty as a rose. Perhaps, he told himself, his attention had been drawn to her because she seemed as much out of place there at Mrs. Magill's as he felt in New York.

He remembered now that she had spoken to him on sight, smiled, and then appeared to freeze. Yes, freeze, and he wondered why.

Hondo Jim went to sleep thinking of her, and that night she romped tantalizingly through his dreams. At breakfast the next morning, she gave him a look that he would have recognized as being a look of reproach tinged heavily with defiance, had he been anybody but the bluff Westerner that he was, with cattle, cattle, cattle on the brain. At the noonday meal he missed her, and he missed her also at supper that evening—and he missed her much more than he would have thought possible. When supper was over, he met Mrs. Magill in the hallway that led to the front, and took her by the arm as though she had been a man instead of a woman.

"Say," he began, "what's become o' the little lady that set right across the table from me? The one with the light hair and blue eyes?"

Mrs. Magill the buxom shrugged. "That," said she, "was Miss Sadie. Miss Sadie McAllister. She's from somewhere out West. Poor little thing, the city was so lonesome for her! She's been trying and trying to land a job, and she always failed; and her money was giving out, I've got reason to believe. She——"

"From the West!" gasped Hondo Jim. "Whereabouts in the West?"

"I don't just know. Texas, maybe; or maybe it was Idaho. Her folks was all dead, and she wanted to live in a city, where she'd have advantages, she said. But she was disappointed in the cities; they were not like those she'd read about in the storybooks, she told us. Poor little thing. I'm sorry for her. She——"

"But where is she?" Clarkson cut in. "I've got to see her, Mrs. Magill."

The buxom Mrs. Magill shrugged her ample shoulders again. "Oh, she's gone. She left this morning. I haven't the slightest idea where she went. She told me she believed she was making a nuisance of herself with her banjo, and——"

But Hondo Jim was streaking it for the front doorway. "What's the matter?" Mrs. Magill called after him. "What's the matter, Mr. Clarkson?"

Mr. Clarkson answered over one of his big shoulders: "Oh, nothin'; nothin' at all."

Once more Mrs. Magill shrugged.

It would be a simple and easy matter to find any particular person in Cobway, New Mexico. To find any particular person in a city such as New York borders on the impossible, unless one has more of a trail to follow than had Hondo Jim. But no matter what the difficulty, the time necessary, or the cost, Clarkson felt that he must find her. He had run her off; with one mean, little, impulsive deed,—and three, mean, little impulsive words,—he had run her off, and her money was giving out! He had to make amends. He simply had to. If he didn't, he could never look mankind in the face again.

As he wormed his way through the endless streets with their endless streams of humanity, he tried to put himself in her place. If he were she, as lonesome as she, without money and without a single friend and without the ability to get work—what would he do? He didn't dare to think of it, that which he feared she would do. The dock, or poison——

Hondo Jim quickened his pace.

He took up quarters in a modest uptown hotel, in order that he might be nearer to the work that engrossed him, and spent all of the following day in walking the streets and looking, looking for Sadie McAllister. All the next day he did the same, and the next, and the next. He went everywhere, it seemed to him; he consulted policemen; he advertised in the newspapers; he even hired a detective to help him.

A week passed, and neither he, the detective nor the newspapers had found her. Then, a little pale and thin, feeling as though he were the worst of murderers, Jim Clarkson went to Mrs. Magill's Select Boarding-house to see Mrs. Magill. It had just occurred to him that perhaps that estimable lady had seen or learned something of Sadie McAllister.

"Mr. Clarkson!" Mrs. Magill cried out heartily at sight of him. She remembered his name—and she had room for another boarder. "I haven't seen you for a long time. Will you come in, Mr. Clarkson?"

Mr. Clarkson would, and did. But he didn't take the chair Mrs. Magill set out for him.

"I'm afraid you're not well——" she began, and Hondo Jim interrupted rather ungallantly:

"Sadie, Sadie McAllister, have you seen her? Has she been back? She left the same day I left, you know?"

"Oh, yes, she's been back," Mrs. Magill answered with maddening slowness. "She came back a day or two after you went. It was the next day, I think. She came back for something she'd forgotten, and decided to stay, as you'd gone. It was you, she said, that objected to her banjo——"

"But where is she now?" Clarkson cut in hopefully.

"Gone back to her West. She was out of tune, she told me, with everything here. She made the decision all in a minute, womanlike. Poor little thing! I guess it was best for her. It's the cities for the people that grow up in them, and the country for those that grow up in the country. You can't transplant——"

"What—what part of the West?"

"Really, I don't know. It was Texas maybe; maybe it was Idaho. If she told me——"

Hondo Jim scarcely heard the rest of it. Anyway, there wasn't a word of enlightenment in the rest of it. He walked out without even a good by, and went slowly toward his hotel. The knowledge that Miss McAllister had gone home brought him untold relief, it was true, but—oh, well, Clarkson wanted to see her. He wanted to ask her to forgive him. He wanted to tell her—he wanted to tell her a lot of things, and now she was gone, Heaven knew where. It is almost as great an undertaking to find one particular person in the vast stretches of the West as it is in New York's wilderness of streets and buildings.

But Clarkson swore to himself that he wouldn't give it up. Either he was very deeply in love with Miss McAllister, or he thought he was, and it amounts to about the same thing.

Within two more hours, he was aboard a sleeper, and flying westward.

In due time, Hondo Jim alighted from a train at Cobway, the nearest railroad point to his ranch on the River Hondo. Cobway is a withered little town of one long street and half-a-dozen short streets, and Clarkson hailed its sleepy, sunbaked appearance with delight because it was home to him—or nearly home. As he went toward Bill Aker's livery stable, he saw things that he had never before known existed in Cobway. Always before he had been busy, busy with cattle, cattle, cattle.

The open doors of a restaurant exuded a savory odor of something being fried, and it reminded Hondo Jim that he was hungry. He walked in, put his suitcase down, hung his hat on a nail in the wall, and dropped into a chair at a small table. There were soft footfalls behind him, and he looked around and upward to see—nobody else on earth but Sadie McAllister!

"You here!" he gasped asininely. "You—Sadie—you here?"

She smiled. Very sweetly, too. And it was the smile of one who, if not happy, is wise enough to be content.

"Yes, Mr. Clarkson, I'm the new waitress. I'll take your order, if you please. We have ham and eggs, bacon and eggs, stewed——"

She broke off as Clarkson rose. He held to his chair with one hand as he turned toward her.

"I was a fool, Sadie," he said weakly—"Sadie, I was an awful fool. After you left, I—I looked all over town for you, and advertised, and had a detective looking for you; I—I did everything. I wanted to apologize, and I—I—dang it, Sadie, I apologize now! I sure hope you'll find it in your heart to forgive me!"

"The banjo? Oh, that's all right. I was so lonesome I just had to play it to keep from—from blowing up! I understand that you went also to St. Louis, Chicago and Buffalo. I did, too, Mr. Clarkson. How did you like the cities?"

He told her in a few words, and without the tiniest syllable of lurid language, exactly how he liked the cities. She laughed merrily when he had finished.

"You were looking," she said, "for just what I was looking for—the ideal city, and there is none this side of the new Jerusalem. We were looking, Mr. Clarkson, for the city that is not."

"You're right," agreed Hondo Jim, gaining confidence in himself but still greatly surprised at finding Sadie McAllister in Cobway, New Mexico,—"dead right. Now tell me this: how comes it that you're here, of all the places I know?"

She laughed again, and to Clarkson it was a charming laugh. He took one of her hands, and she, after making sure that there was nobody to see or overhear, allowed him to keep it and answered:

"Why, this is home to me. I've lived here all my life. And you really didn't know it? Hondo Jim, I've known you by sight ever since I was a little girl; I used to make believe you were a knight, on that black horse you used to ride, and I—when you spoke to me so coldly there at Mrs. Magill's——"

"After you'd smiled at me because I was from Cobway, New Mexico,—little lady, I sure follow you! Say, I need a wife out at my ranch, somebody to keep me from—er, goin' back to the woods like a chaparral cock that's been hatched in captivity under a hen. Will you, Sadie?"

and try to please him and I know he does the same.

We have a little girl nearly four years old and a baby boy ten months old, whose picture I am sending to Mrs. Wilkinson to put in COMFORT. His name is Arnold Howard Brandon. Above everything else I want to raise my children in the right way and to teach them about the Bible. My little girl knows all the pictures in the Bible and can tell me about them. I want them to be Christians.

Love to all. MRS. CARL BRANDON.

OAKLAND, OREGON.

DEAR SISTERS:

Mrs. Wilkinson's answer to Mrs. Lee's letter interests me very much. So much depends upon the antidotes of the poisons we have in the house. As long as fly poisons are on the market, housekeepers will continue to use them. Or, our children may get the poison at the home of a playmate, so keeping poisons away from your home doesn't entirely evade the danger.

I had a similar experience six years ago which I am going to relate to show you what knowledge and quick action did.

My three eldest children were girls, Mildred, Kathleen and Frances, the first and third being taken away while infants. Then came James Hartleigh, a big, blue-eyed, mischievous boy, interested in everything his father did. Kathleen was always interested too but never touched anything with which her father was working.

The day of the accident, James was two and one half years old. His father was making an assay, using nitric and hydrochloric acid, equal parts, and had about an ounce in the test tube. In this he put the metal to be tested and bade the children keep back as the fumes are also poison. Dinner was ready and, believing James couldn't possibly reach it, he set it in a basin pushed back on a table on the porch, washed and was just sitting down to the table when I turned to put the child in his high chair. He was gone. He was by my side when his father came to the table. I thought of the acid and then I never shall forget the strangled scream. I reached his side in one bound: the sight paralyzed me. I remember how two had already gone.

He had stood on tiptoe to reach the basin and managed to get hold of the tube; as he lifted it out the contents poured over his hand and down onto his face. As I turned with him to his father I tried to say, "Do you suppose he has swallowed any?" but "suppose" was as far as I got. The answer I received was, "Suppose and get busy." That was all I needed to bring me back to salt and soda. By the time he had the youngster over his knee, head thrown back and mouth forced open, I was there with a box of soda and a cup of water. He put soda in the child's mouth and then poured in some water to wash it down; threw some soda in the cup and put it on his eyes, face and hands. I then got salt and he forced salt and water down the child's throat. Then he went for the doctor, but when they returned, half an hour later, vomiting had set in and the child was out of danger.

I still keep acids in the house labeled and away from other medicines. But James has never meddled with acids since, though still very mischievous. I believe this experience will keep my children from meddling with unknown medicines, especially James.

I think it would be a good idea if COMFORT would print some antidotes for poisons.

MRS. J. H. RODGERS.

Mrs. Rodgers.—Thanks for the suggestion. You will find a few antidotes in the space devoted to "remedies," and more will follow.—Ed.

YOST, KY.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Words cannot express my appreciation of and love for COMFORT and its whole staff and contributors. I read it from cover to cover, even the ads. which I find interesting and instructive.

I want to add another caution to our editor's reply to Mrs. Josie Lee. Be very careful about leaving little folks in a room with an open fire. Our own baby girl, when she was three years old, caught fire, though she had not been alone in the room four minutes. Fortunately I was in the next room and reached her in time to prevent any serious injury.

How many believe in teaching boys to do girls' work and vice versa? I do and my three boys can wash dishes, sweep, help with the cooking and do lots of little things around the house, and the oldest knows how to sew on the machine and how to sew on buttons. Even if they never need to do such things the knowledge won't hurt them.

Mrs. Maggie Robinson, what do you do when you have so many duties that you can't for the life of you tell which is nearest? That is usually my trouble. I am slow, always behind with my work and invariably have to take the nine stitches instead of the one in time.

We are very poor and do not have money enough to fuss over. What we do have is used by the one who needs it first or worst.

Driven Apart

But there was one who did not wait for Beryl's wealth to be known before she came, acknowledged her worth, and sought a reconciliation. This was Neil's mother. Neither could Mrs. Burton Preston forget that to Beryl, whom she had cruelly wronged, she owed her life. The haughty woman's pride was humbled. Beryl was not slow to forget and forgive, because she was eager to do everything she could for Neil's happiness.

In Berdyne's settlement with Beryl, a mortgage of five thousand dollars against Sunset Ranch, long overdue, fell to her. As a token of esteem for "Mother Jackman," Beryl canceled the mortgage, and forwarded it to the good woman who had always been her friend. Thus she heaped coals of fire upon the head of the faithless ranchman.

Help was also extended by Neil and Beryl to Mr. Bickerdyke and his daughter, who had lost everything in the fire.

The people of San Francisco have already rebuilt the wrecked parts of the city, which has arisen from the ruins more lovely than before. Neil and his beautiful wife sometimes motor through the streets where once they searched wildly for each other. But for the most part they live in Denver near Mrs. Preston, who is almost as happy as they are.

Novelty in Filet Crochet for Children

Child's Combination Collar and Front

BY MRS. MABEL KELLER.

MATERIALS: 3 balls No. 80 white mercerized crochet cotton and steel crochet hook of suitable size.

Work is begun at the end of the belt. Chain 71 stitches.

1st row.—1 d. c. in 9th st from hook, ch 2, skip 2, 1 d c. Repeat to end of row making 22 spaces in all. Ch 5, turn.

Six next rows.—All same as first row.

8th row.—Ten sps, 4 d c (1 block), 1 block in next space, 10 spaces, ch 5, turn.

9th row.—9 sps, 4 blks, 9 sps, ch 5, turn.

10th row.—In this row we make the opening in end of belt shown in the illustration. To do this, make 5 sps, ch 36, skip 12 spaces, 5 sps over last 5 sps in last row. Ch 5, turn.

11th row.—5 sps over 5 sps, 5 sps on ch, 4 blks or 13 d c and 5 sps, all on ch 36, 5 sps over 5 sps, ch 5, turn.

12th row.—11 sps, 2 blks, 11 sps, ch 5, turn.

Next 6 rows each of 22 sps.

19th row.—Slip st over 1st 5 sps, ch 5, 12 sps over next 12 sps, ch 5, turn.

Repeat 19th row 18 times.

In next row work 5 sps, 1 blk, 6 sps. Then 18 rows of 12 sps each and finish this end of belt same as other end.

One now continues the work of the front by working along the side of the center of the belt. Begin to do this by making 1 d c in the end of the 5th row of 12 sps, ch 2, 1 d c. Repeat making 29 sps in all.

2nd and 3rd rows.—Each 29 sps.

4th row.—13 sps, 1 blk, 1 sp, 1 blk, 13 sps, ch 5, turn. End each row as usual with ch 5.

5th row.—12 sps, 1 blk, 3 sps, 1 blk, 12 sps.

6th row.—11 sps, 1 blk, 5 sps, 1 blk, 11 sps.

7th row.—10 sps, 1 blk, 7 sps, 1 blk, 10 sps.

8th row.—9 sps, 1 blk, 9 sps, 1 blk, 9 sps, ch 20, turn.

9th row.—1 d c in 9th st from hook, 4 more sps in chain, 8 sps over 8 sps, 1 blk, 5 sps, 1 blk, 5 sps, 1 blk, 8 sps, ch 5, turn.

10th row.—7 sps, 1 blk, 4 sps, 1 blk, 3 sps, 1 blk, 4 sps, 1 blk, 12 sps.

11th row.—11 sps, 1 blk, 7 sps, 1 blk, 7 sps, 1 blk, 6 sps. Now ch 5 and make 1 d c between this row and last or 10th row. Chain 2, 1 d c, ch 2, 1 d c making 2 sps along the ends of the 9th and 8th rows. Chain 5, turn, 3 sps over 3 end sps just worked, ch 5, 3 sps on same sps. Repeat twice more. This makes a group of 5 rows 3 sps each, turn sl st over 3 sps, ch 5.

12th row.—Work 5 sps along ends of 3 sps, 5 sps on sps, 1 blk, 17 sps, 1 blk, 10 sps.

13th row.—9 sps, 1 blk, 19 sps, 1 blk, 9 sps.

14th row.—8 sps, 1 blk, 21 sps, 1 blk, 8 sps.

15th row.—7 sps, 1 blk, 23 sps, 1 blk, 7 sps.

16th row.—6 sps, 1 blk, 25 sps, 1 blk, 6 sps, ch 36, turn.

17th row.—10 sps on chain, 5 sps, 1 blk, 27 sps, 1 blk, 5 sps.

18th row.—4 sps, 1 blk, 29 sps, 1 blk, 14 sps.

4th row.—10 s c under each of 4 chs of 9, ch 1, 1 s c, on each s c. Repeat from 3rd row and join when complete.

29th row.—3 sps, 1 blk, 13 sps, 4 blks, 2 sps, 2 blks, 1 sp, 3 blks, 1 sp, 2 blks, 2 sps, 4 blks, 13 sps, 1 blk, 9 sps.

SIMPLE CROCHETED WHEELS.

Simple Crocheted Wheels

Our illustration gives a good idea how effective this simple and easily made crocheted wheel may be used joined to form insertion or edging. It can also be used for pillow covers, scarf ends or yokes for camisoles or nightgowns.

A fine or coarse cotton may be used according to the quality of the article to be trimmed.

Directions for making wheels: Ch 6, join in ring, ch 4.

2nd round.—1 d d, c (thread over 3 times), keeping last loop on the hook, 1 d c, working off the last loop with loop already on the hook. Ch 5, 2 d, d c, 1 d c keeping 1 loop of each st on the hook and working all off together. Continue working into the center ring in this way until one has 8 groups of stitches with chains 5 between. Ch 5, join to first group.

3rd round.—2 s c under first ch 5, ch 3 for picot, 2 s c, 1 p, 2 s c, repeat under each ch 5, fasten and break thread. In making either an insertion or edging join the wheels by the picots as shown.

Beading and Edging

This simple little pattern may be very rapidly made and is especially good for edging under clothes. Any number cotton may be used in either white or colors.

BEADING AND EDGING.

Ch 9 sts, 1 d c in 4th st from hook, ch 1, 1 d c in same st, repeat 4 times making 6 d c in all, ch 4, 1 d c in end first ch, * ch 8, 1 s c between 3rd and 4th doubles in shell, ch 1, 1 s c in same place, ch 3, 1 shell of 6 doubles under ch between singles, ch 4, 1 d c under ch 8, repeat from *.

CHARITY KNICHEN.

In making iron holders spread a sheet of asbestos or leather between two pieces of denim. This will make a holder that is light, easily held and impervious to heat.

Simple Patterns for Various Purposes

Spider Web Edging

IF made of No. 15 white crochet cotton this edging will be about seven inches wide.

Ch 112 sts, turn.

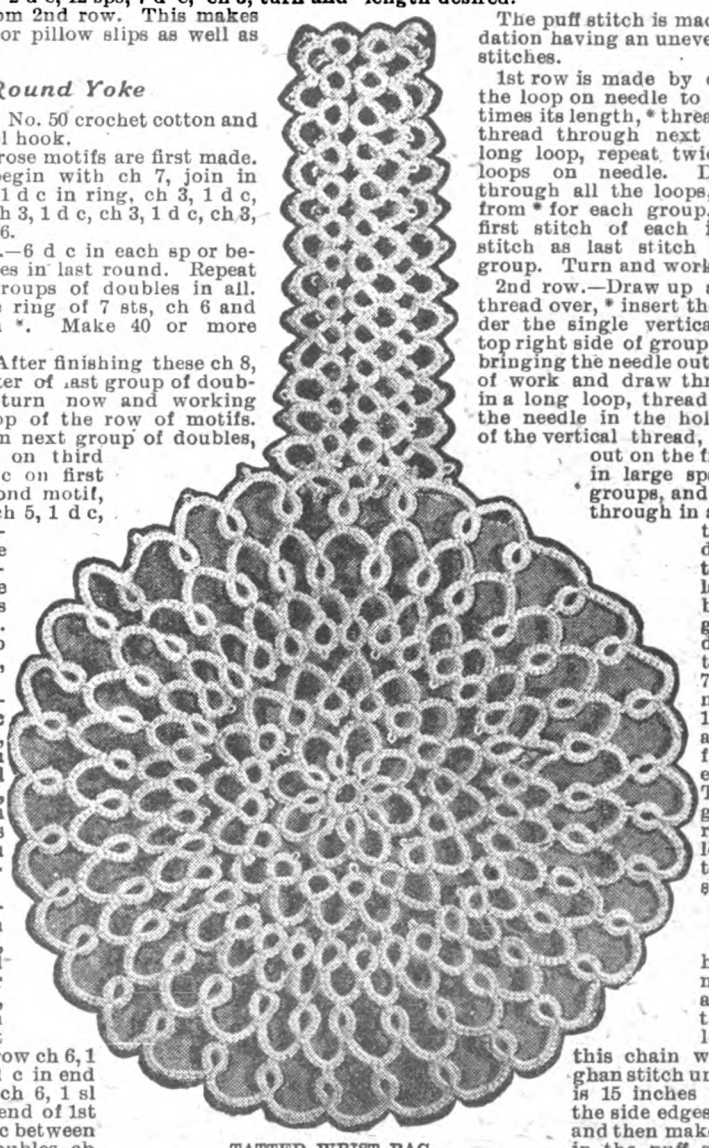
ROUND YOKE. By Fannie Relinskie.

13th row.—2 d c, 15 sps, 7 d c, ch 3, turn.

14th row—6 d c on 6 d c, 7 sps, 1 puff, 7 sps, 2 d c, 1 sp, ch 5, turn.

15th row.—2 d c, 12 sps, 7 d c, ch 3, turn and continue from 2nd row. This makes pretty lace for pillow slips as well as scarfs.



Round Yoke

Materials: No. 50 crochet cotton and suitable steel hook.

The little rose motifs are first made. For these begin with ch 7, join in ring, ch 6, * 1 d c in ring, ch 3, 1 d c, ch 3, 1 d c, ch 3, 1 d c, ch 3, 1 d c, ch 3, slip st to ch 6.

2nd round.—6 d c in each sp or between doubles in last round. Repeat making 6 groups of doubles in all. Ch 13, make ring of 7 sts, ch 6 and repeat from *. Make 40 or more motifs.

1st row.—After finishing these ch 8, 1 d c in center of last group of doubles, one is turn now and working along the top of the row of motifs. Ch 5, 1 s c on next group of doubles, ch 5, 1 d c on third group, 1 d c on first group of second motif, ch 5, 1 s c, ch 5, 1 d c, thus working over the second motifs in the same way as over the first. Repeat to end of work, turn.

TATTED WRIST BAG.

2nd row.—Ch 6, 1 d c under ch 5, ch 2, 1 d c on s c, ch 2, 1 d c under ch 5, ch 2, 1 d c on 2 doubles just between motifs. Repeat.

3rd row.—Ch 7, 1 tr in 1st sp, * ch 3, 1 tr c in 3rd sp, ch 2, 1 tr c in same sp, repeat from *. After last tr in end of row ch 6, 1 sl st under d c in end of 2nd row, ch 6, 1 sl st under ch end of 1st row, ch 5, 1 s c between groups of doubles, ch 5, 1 s c in 4th d c of next group of doubles.

4th row.—Ch 10, now working along the lower edge of motifs make 1 s c in 2nd group of doubles, ch 9, 1 d c in next group doubles, 1 d c in 1st group of next motif, ch 9, 1 s c, ch 9, 1 d c, working as on 1st motif. Repeat.

5th row.—Ch 9, 1 sl st in 6th st to form picot, ch 3, 1 s c under ch 9, ch 6, form p, ch 6, form p, ch 3, 1 s c under ch 9, repeat, turn with 1 p ch.

Next 3 rows same as 5th row.

9th row.—Ch 6, 1 s c between picots, ch 6, 1 s c same place, 1 p, ch, 1 s c between picots of next ch, ch 6, 1 s c same place. Repeat to end. Continue in same way to top of yoke.

Fan Edge.—Between each 2 tr make fan of 1 d c, ch 3, 1 d c, ch 3, 1 d c, ch 3, 1 d c. Along the bottom work these fans in the loops formed by chs 6.

FANNIE RELINSKIE.

Automobile Bonnet and Veil

Tam-o-shanter bonnet is of grey Germantown and veil of pink Iceland wool.

With suitable size hook begin crocheting bonnet with ch 4, join.

1st round.—18 d c in ring, ch 3.

2nd round.—2 d c in each st, ch 3.

3rd round.—Same as 2nd round.

4th round.—1 d c in each d c, ch 3.

5th round.—1 d c in each 1st 4 d c, 2 d c in 5th st, repeat all around, ch 3.

Next four rounds the same.

10th round.—2 d c, sk 1, 2 d c, repeat around, leaving last 24 sts for neck, ch 1, turn s c back to beginning 10th round, 8 more rows s c for front band, widening 1st at center in last 3 rows, sl st around front of band, ends of band and work closely across neck, making 1 p in every 3rd st.

Make three straps of single crochet. These are fastened to the sides and the center of the front band of the hat. These bands are 5 sts wide and 2 inches long. Attach one end of center strap to edge of band and fasten the other end down with a snap. The end straps are sewed on like a ring through which the veil runs and ties under the chin or in the back.

The adjustable center strap makes it possible to lower the veil very easily when needed.

Knitted Veil

With Iceland wool cast 60 sts on No. 4 knitting needle.

1st row.—K plain.

2nd row.—K 4 sts, * k 2 sts together wool over twice, k 4, repeat from *.

Repeat these 2 rows until veil is 1 yard long, always knitting 2 threads over needle as one st. Bind off loosely, finish with fringe if desired. Roll and run through straps on front of bonnet.

Crocheted Autumn Set

Materials: No. 3 mercerized crocheted cotton, fine bone crochet hook.

This set is made up largely of afghan and puff stitches.

For afghan stitch:

1st row.—Draw a loop of thread through each stitch beneath, holding all loops on the needle. For repeats of this row, pick up the vertical thread of previous row.

2nd row.—Draw thread through first loop, then * through 2 loops, repeating from * for entire row. Ch 1, and repeat these rows for length desired.

The puff stitch is made on a foundation having an uneven number of stitches.

1st row is made by drawing out the loop on needle to about three times its length, * thread over, draw thread through next stitch to a long loop, repeat twice making 7 loops on needle. Draw thread through all the loops, ch 1, repeat from * for each group, making the first stitch of each in the same stitch as last stitch of previous group. Turn and work.

The Cap

Measure the head and make a chain a little more than half this length. On this chain work the afghan stitch until the work is 15 inches deep. Join the side edges of the work and then make the border in the puff stitch, turning at the end of every round, so that the work is really done back and forth. There are 12 rows in all. For the pompons wind the cotton around a cardboard or book about four inches across, cut on one edge, tie the lengths together in the middle, trim the ends evenly and sew securely over the drawn up sides of the central part of the cap. The pompons may be worn either at the sides or at the front and back as is most becoming.

The Bag

Ch 9 and join in ring. Over this work 20 s c, cut and fasten thread. Make eight of these rings which are to be picked up when working the next to the last row of the afghan stitch for the bag, one near each edge and two evenly spaced between, making four rings on each half of bag. Make two pieces of the afghan stitch, each five inches square. Join and work the border of puff stitch, on the lower edge, the same for the cap. On the upper edge, the border is only half as wide. The upper edge is finished with * ch 3, s c in next st, and repeat around.

Make 3 one-yard lengths of chain stitches, and braid these for each cord. Finish with tassels of the cut lengths of cottons. Tie a fringe in the lower edge of bag, drawing through both sides.

The Scarf

Work a piece in afghan stitch eight inches wide and one yard long. At each end work a border of puff st, 2 inches of afghan st, and finish with another border of puff st. Fringe the ends.

Gentleman's Crocheted Tie

BY NEVA CHRISTY.

For this shaped flare end tie one can use either silk one of the fiber silks, or a mercerized cotton. Select a steel hook of a size which will make the work close and firm.

CROCHETED NECKTIE.

Begin with ch 57 sts, turn, sk first st, 1 s c in each of the 56 sts. Repeat for 28 rows.

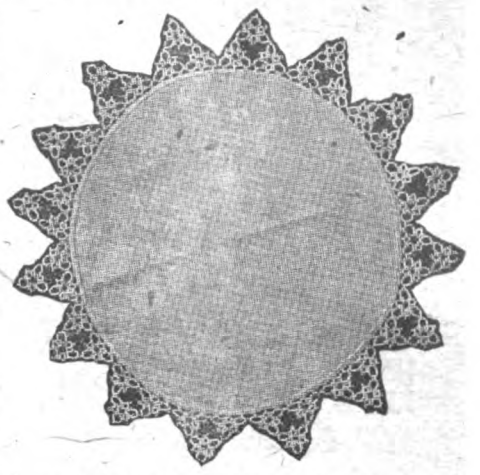
Then skip first and last sts, thus decreasing by 2 and work 24 rows on these 54 sts.

Decrease by 2 again in next row and work 20 rows on 52 sts. Decrease 2 again and work 16 rows on 50 sts, decrease 2 and work 12 rows on 48 sts, decrease 2 and work 8 rows, decrease 2 and work 4 rows.

Now continue to decrease 2 sts in every 4th row until there are 12 or 14 sts only—according to how one works. Width should be decided by measuring neck-band of a silk necktie.

Make neck-band about 14 or 15 inches, but do not make it too long as a hand-made tie will stretch with use.

Increase by making 2 s c in the first and last sts.



Increase every 4th row until there are 20 sts. Work about 12 inches.

To point the broad end work 1 s c in 56 sts of 1st row then decrease 2 sts each row by skipping the first and last sts.

Tatted Point-Edged Doily

This pattern can be used on a doily of any size. The linen center should be buttonholed or crocheted around and then the tatting handsewed to this.

Tatted Motifs.—Small ring 4 d s, 1 p, 2 d s, 1 p, 2 d s, 1 p, 4 d s. Large ring 8 d s, 1 p, 8 d s. Make three large and 3 small rings, placing alternately. Join second motif to first by picots in large rings as shown.

TATTED POINT-EDGED DOILY.

Place a third motif over two, joining picots of large rings to picots of third large rings of motifs in the first row.

On large doilies larger points may be made by placing two motifs over three and over these one.

Tatted Wrist Bag

BY MRS. F. B. RECTOR.

Work is begun in the center with ring of 2 d s, 1 p, 2 d s, 1 p, repeat making 8 p, 2 d s, close. Break and tie thread.

2nd round—Ring 6 d s, join to p of 1st ring, 6 d s, close. With 2 threads make chain 6 d s, 1 p, 6 d s. Repeat making 8 rings. Break and tie thread as each round is finished.

3rd round.—Ring 4 d s, 1 p, 4 d s, join to p of ch, 4 d s, 1 p, 4 d s, 1 ch same as in last round. Repeat and tie.

4th round.—Same as last.

5th round.—Ring 6 d s, join to ch in 4th round, 6 d s, ch 6 d s, 1 p, 6 d s. Repeat and tie.

6th round.—Same as last.

Make two of these medallions and join by picots of chains in making the last row. For wrist-band make ring of 4 d s, 1 p, 4 d s, then ch of 6 d s, 1 p, 6 d s, repeat, joining picots. Make this strip about 8 inches or longer if desired. Add another row like the first joining together by center picots of rings.

These bags are designed to hold one's ball of cotton when crocheting, and are most convenient.

Narrow Lace

Ch 12, turn.

1st row.—6 d c in 4th st from hook ch 2, 1 d c in each last 6 sts of first ch, ch 8, turn.

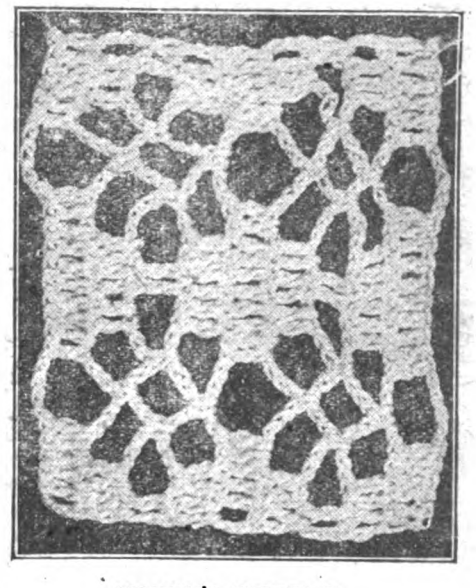
NARROW LACE.

2nd row.—1 d c on 6th double in last row, ch 2, 6 d c on 6 d c, ch 3, turn.

3rd row.—6 d c, ch 2, 6 d c under ch, ch 8.

4th row.—Same as 2nd row. Repeat pattern.

MRS. OSCAR WILSON.



Mother's Insertion

Make a chain 35 sts, turn.

1st row.—1 d c in 4th st from hook, 5 d c, in next 5 sts, ch 5, sk 5 sts, 10 d c in next 10 sts, ch 5, sk 5 sts, 6 d c, ch 3, turn.

2nd row.—3 d c, in 3 d c, ch 5, s c over ch 5 of 1st row, ch 5, sk 2 d c, 6 d c in next 6 d c, ch 5, s c over ch 5, ch 5, sk 2 d c, 4 d c over next 4 d c, ch 3, turn.

3rd row.—1 d c, * ch 5, s c over ch 5, * twice, ch 5, sk 2 d c, 2 d c in next 2, * ch 5, s c over ch 5, * twice, ch 5, sk 2 d c, 2 d c in last 2, ch 3, turn.

MOTHER'S INSERTION.

4th row.—1 d c, in d c, 2 d c on first 2 sts of ch 5, ch 5, s c over ch 5, 2 d c on last 2 sts of ch 5, 2 d c in 2 d c, 2 d c on ch 5, ch 5, s c over ch 5, ch 5, 2 d c over last 2 sts of ch 5, 2 d c in last 2 d c, ch 3, turn.

5th row.—4 d c over 4 d c, 2 d c on ch 5, ch 5, 2 d c on ch 5, 4 d c over 4 d c, 2 d c, on ch 5, ch 5, 2 d c on ch 5, 4 d c over 4 d c, ch 3, turn, repeat from 2nd row to length desired.

It is a very old pattern as it is one mother crocheted when she was a girl about thirty or forty years ago. From a reader of COMFORT.

explain everything to you," and, with the words she shrank into the darkness and disappeared.

Poindexter slowly strolled to the big entrance and just reached it when the girl appeared, and, smiling at him, she approached his side and slipped her arm within his.

Some people stared, but he paid no attention to them and led the way to an unfrequented path leading away from the hotel.

As soon as they were quite alone, the girl began:

"Perhaps you will not wish to be mixed up in this. I am in with a set of international jewel thieves and I have upon my person a string of pearls worth a fortune. I know there is a plot afoot to chloroform me tonight and search my room for the string. I do not care about that for it would not be the first time the game has been played to keep me quiet. But if they do, they will find nothing, for I want you to keep the string for me until morning. Shall you do that?"

"Do you think, as a law-abiding citizen, I am doing the right thing——"

"Oh," she interrupted a bit haughtily, "if you are afraid——"

"Not at all," he answered quickly, for no man can bear an aspersion upon his bravery, "it is because my desire as a man conflicts with my sense of duty as a citizen. Still——"

"You will do society a great service by helping me," she responded, tears in her voice. "I want to save the pearls for their rightful owner."

"Then why not turn them over to the detectives since you do not wish to keep them?"

"And be caught with stolen goods? Or be discovered as a traitor to the set in which I am? I want to deliver them to their rightful owner, cast myself upon her mercy and be quit of the whole outrageous transaction!"

Though a little incoherent, Poindexter sensed her position at once. "I will help you, for I trust you, Miss——" He hesitated over the lack of her name.

"I am known as Madam Petrovich, though I am not married. Here I go by the name of Stella Langtry. Well, if you will help me, here is the string," and from beneath one of the ornaments of her gown, she drew the pearls and handed them to him.

He had no time to examine them except to note that they were of good weight and had a curious, diamond-studded clasp.

He dropped the string into his inside pocket.

"Such a relief," sighed Madam Petrovich. "We may go back now. If I see a mutual acquaintance, may I say that we were acquaintances in New York? I shall see, though, that you need not acknowledge me unnecessarily."

"Very well," he replied. "But would you not like to stroll about a bit? The Promontory is beautiful by moonlight."

She nodded and slowly they wandered toward the silvery beach. The moon was now high in the heavens. The girl walked slowly, with exquisite grace, and Poindexter wondered that she could have allowed herself to become mixed up with a set of thieves. But, then, those gangs always secured the help of beautiful women in their machinations. Beauty is always associated with purity and truth. He wondered if the beautiful creature had really repented, and could she be brought back to enter in at the straight and narrow gate?

Then he called himself a fool and—pardon! it was his own expression—a "nut" who had been artfully taken in by a very clever woman, because the moon was in his head. No doubt, tomorrow morning he would wonder at his mild lunacy.

Madam Petrovich chatted on non-essentials and seemed anxious to keep him at her side—as her protector, no doubt. But now she probably realized that she was monopolizing his time, and suggested that they return to the hotel.

They did so, and as they approached the building, the strains of a joyous jazz band came to them.

"You dance, madam?" he enquired.

"Divinely, they tell me," she smiled. "I was once in the Russian ballet."

When Madam Petrovich said she danced divinely, she had not overstated her accomplishment, and as Poindexter was out of the ordinary run of dancers, they made an attractive couple.

The dance finished, but so enjoyable had it been that Poindexter asked for several more, so that, hardly realizing it, he remained at Madam Petrovich's side until at length the music ceased, and the hotel guests gradually started for their rooms.

Madam Petrovich arose.

"I've kept you too long," she said with self-censure. "I must have bored you. You will forgive me?"

"Don't speak of having bored me, Madam. You helped me spend what promised to be a very ordinary night."

"Ah, thank you, so much," and with a good night, she was gone.

Poindexter went to his room, and, sitting on the edge of the bed, drew forth the pearls, and as he did so encountered the telegram he had received. He had entirely forgotten Montgomery's instructions to look up Miss Lansdonne. He was glad he had. Could he have enjoyed the evening more thoroughly with a conventional society girl than he had with Madam Petrovich, the adventuress?

His thoughts came back to the pearls. For a moment he was undecided, then he placed them with his own valuables under his pillow, undressed and went to bed.

In the darkness he seemed to see a face of wondrous beauty framed in dark hair and set off with a great bird of Paradise. Sometimes the eyes were a little wistful, now a bit roguish. Surely she was not a bad woman. But, stop! He must be careful! What was happening to his heart?

At length he slept, with one eye open, he thought, but suddenly he awoke and night was gone. Early dawn flushed the sky and the sun was pushing long golden fingers into the room.

His first thought was of the string of pearls. His hand slipped under his pillow. He thrilled with sickening horror.

It was gone!

Someone must have witnessed the transaction of the night before, for an ordinary thief would have taken his purse and watch which this thief did not.

How was he going to square himself with Madam Petrovich? But what else could be expected? Jewel thieves were superior to honest fellows who, when they went to bed, slept the sleep of the just.

In an agony of self-aversion, he dressed and hurried outside. He must think up some plan. Perhaps his carelessness would drive the girl back to the gang of thieves. And what vengeance might they not take upon her for her attempt to bolt?

Unconsciously he had hurried to the beach and there he beheld the girl. He hurried to her side.

"Dear me, Madam, what excuse shall I offer for my carelessness? The pearls have been stolen from me!"

Madam Petrovich bestowed upon him an icy stare.

"I believe you are mistaken," she replied coldly. "I am not Madam Petrovich and do not know whereof you speak."

"Why, surely—surely——" He stopped short and stared at the girl. For about her neck was the identical string of pearls. He knew it from the diamond-studded clasp, which had worked itself to the side of her neck.

"The pearls——" he began.

But the girl, positive alarm in her eyes, moved away.

Poindexter passed his hands through his hair in perplexity. Great guns! Was he going mad?

That thought gave him an idea. Perhaps it was the other way around. Possibly the woman was afflicted with dementia and had in an irrational moment told him all she had, and then, the attack passing, she realized what she had done and in some nocturnal fashion gained entrance to his room and had again taken her pearls.

He watched her as she walked toward the hotel, nothing Russian nor foreign in her manner or dress now.

He, too, then went slowly back to the hotel and to breakfast. Later the girl came in and with a young chap who seemed to exercise a certain amount of authority over her.

Was the poor creature indeed demented?

As he sat at the table, another telegram was brought to him. He tore it open and read:

"OLD DEAR:

"Have you met Sylvia yet? Some stunning girl, isn't she? Not of conventional type, is she? Hope you are enjoying your stay. MONTGOMERY."

Miss Lansdonne again? Well, he'd look her up since Monty was anxious for him to meet her. But not until he had found out more about Madam Petrovich.

When evening came on, and he again went in to dinner, the girl again appeared, dressed even as gorgeously as the evening before. And again she seemed to be studying him, though Poindexter could not catch her at it.

Finished, he left the room, smoked his cigar and then, when the moon was high in the heavens, strolled to the beach and sat down on the timbers of an old hulk deeply embedded in the sand.

Suddenly he became aware of the woman again approaching him.

"Mr. Poindexter," she began, "will you adjudge a wager?"

He looked curiously at her. She seemed to be smiling.

"More lunacy?" he queried mildly.

"Oh, no. A mutual acquaintance thinks I could not act in the movies. What did you think of my performance last night? Do I win or does—Franklin Montgomery?"

As a flash it came to him. It was Monty's waggish work!

"You are Sylvia Lansdonne!" he exclaimed.

She smiled and nodded her head.

"Franklin said I couldn't act. I declared that I could. Then he dared me to do what I did, and you were to judge whether I did it naturally."

"So naturally," he exclaimed rapturously, "that I had already been dreaming of how I could rescue you from the clutches of your diamond thieves!"

"But this morning? Did you not suspect?"

"No. I thought you were demented and felt sorry for you."

"Then I win all around?"

"No."

"Why?" She seemed suddenly disappointed.

"Because if I gave you the decision it might tempt you to go into the movies, Miss Lansdonne, and I wouldn't want that."

"Why not?" she demanded.

"It does not behoove me to tell you that, having met you only last night," he side-stepped. "However, I hope that some day I may."

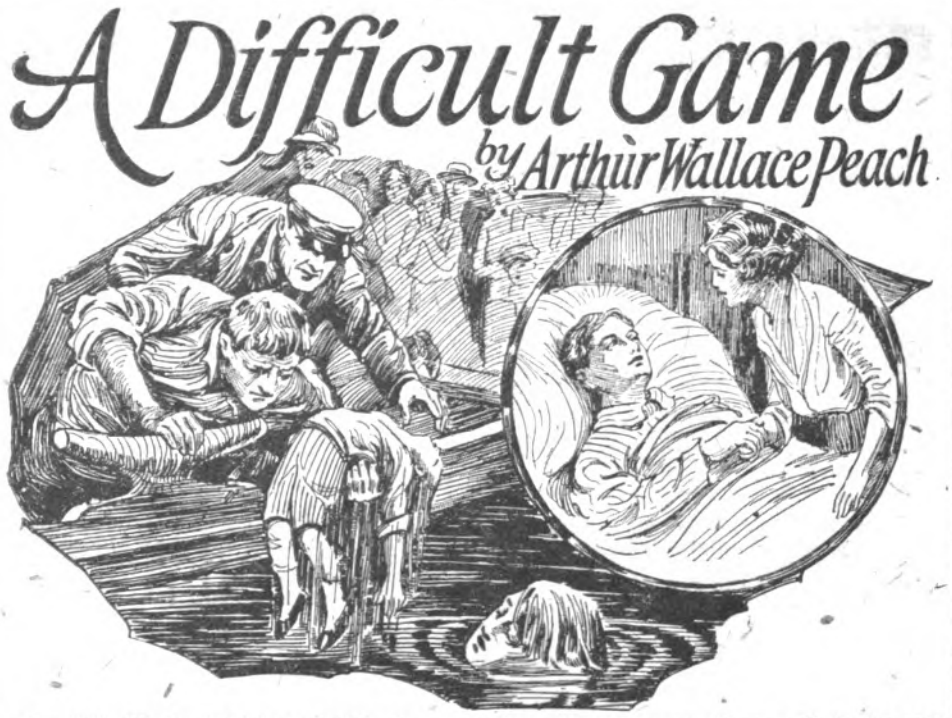
"Then you were not annoyed by this bit of mid-summer night madness?"

"Not at all."

"And it is forgiven?"

"On condition that I may dance with you many times tonight and that we will be very good friends hereafter."

"I accept the conditions," Miss Lansdonne said, holding out her hand.



Poindexter caught it in his. Then his eyes rested upon the string of pearls which she had about her throat.

"How did you get these back?" he asked. "I've exhausted every conjecture."

She smiled. "You saw the young man with me at breakfast?" And as Poindexter nodded, she continued: "He is my brother. His room is next to yours. He climbed along the brick facing of the building, into your room and purloined the string while you slept."

A Difficult Game

by Arthur Wallace Peach

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

MRS. Hammond looked soberly at her husband, and her eyes were serious with her thoughts. "Ted, here is a chance for us to do some missionary work——"

"Hold off, my dear! I'm up here at the cottage to rest, and I don't want to be mixed up in any missionary work unless I am the subject of it," he interjected.

"But listen—here is a letter from Jameson; his niece has been outrageously jilted by some chap there to whom she was engaged—or they have quarreled; and the trouble seems to have broken her heart. Anyway, he wants to send her up to us and to have her spend two or three weeks at the cottage. He says he knows from experience that here is the place for healing."

Hammond snorted a bit. "Same old line that James usually hands out. But his heart is in the right place any way. Tell him to send her along. If she is good-looking and fits into the landscape, I shall be satisfied."

When Lilla Cranston did arrive, he found nothing to criticize but much to praise. She was a dark-haired, dark-eyed slip of a girl who won his masculine heart immediately. Attractive as a rose she was; Hammond often wondered who the chump was that had left her in the lurch. He discovered to his pleasure that she could swim and liked to fish—accomplishments that his wife did not possess.

In spite, however, of his earnest efforts he could not drive the shadows from her eyes—shadows that persisted in coming even in the midst of their fun. So Hammond took a hand in the missionary work.

"Belle," he announced to his wife, "I am passe. I managed to keep you interested until you fell in love with me. Now, no comment is necessary; but this slip of a girl has a shadow in her heart. Here's my scheme. What she needs is some fine chap of her own age to come here and cheer her up! December and May don't hitch. What do you say? Let's get another missionary on the job!"

"But where are you going to find him?" she queried.

He thought a moment. "By Jove, why not write to Jameson to send along the rival to the chap who jilted her? She's beautiful as a rose; she must have had other lovers than this lemon. Why not?"

"Ted, I am proud of you. We'll try it anyway," was her reply.

Jameson's answer came back quickly. The note read: "Dear Belle:—I am sending by this express the missionary you desire. Leave him alone with her as much as possible, and don't let Ted butt in. Report developments. Cordially yours, James."

Hammond snorted. "I like that reference to myself. However, I'll take the hint. I'll even send her in the car to get him."

He kept his word. When he told her of the errand, he saw a faint light of new interest in the quiet darkness of her eyes. Mrs. Hammond added her word, "He's guaranteed by an old friend of yours, Lilla, so handle him with care."

From her own point of view Lilla was in a hidden way amused over the situation. She was aware that the Hammonds had known of her trouble with Robert Philbrick, but she did not know of the plot forged about her. She thought she was going to meet some one of the friends often invited to the hospitable Hammond cottage, and with natural curiosity she wondered who he was and what he would be like. It did not occur to her until she was almost at the little village station that she did not know his name.

When the express paused for its brief breathing-time at the station, she saw a tall figure alight and look enquiringly about, then come in her direction. One glance at his face, and she drew back with a low cry.

He came up and stopped short, his face tense with astonishment. He was the first to rally.

"Lilla, what does this mean?" he asked, a trace of wonder and a bit of hope in his voice.

"I don't know. I was told I was to meet a friend—and you come," she said a little bitterly.

"Then you don't regard me as a friend?"

"How do you regard me? Oh, let's not quarrel again. You are a guest of the Hammonds; so am I. Suppose we carry out the scheme. I shall make believe I like you if you will do the same with me."

He nodded, his face a little white, as he entered the car.

The playing of the game began the next day.

"You may take me fishing, canoeing and swimming," she said calmly. "It will only last a short time."

He smiled. "I will gladly, and you remember you are to appear as if you were interested in me."

The game was played so skillfully that Mrs. Hammond did not sense the true situation, and her motherly heart was cheered at the sight of the young people evidently enjoying each other's company. Hammond, himself, keener-eyed, saw that something was wrong, but he did not suspect that Jameson had sent Robert Philbrick himself.

The young couple fished, canoed and swam together; and only when out of sight of the older folks did the true situation reveal itself. Once Robert unthinkingly put his arms about her as he raised her to the float from which they were diving. She quivered in his arms, and he may have held her longer than necessary; anyway, she turned upon him desperately:

"Robert, you must not—you must not—touch me!"

Then leaving him staring after her, she ran to the boathouse. He had lingered a moment, feeling still the thrill of her flesh against his. Then he had gone quietly to the dressing-room. Sadly, he realized that he loved her as much as he did in the golden days past before the idiotic quarrel which had parted them.

He sought her out that evening, deliberately when she was with Mrs. Hammond. "Miss Cranston, will you take a stroll with me?"

Her eyes rested upon him without anger at his taking advantage of the situation. She agreed.

They strolled down the path along the lake shore. Suddenly, he stopped,—"Lilla, these days are becoming days of heartache for me. I can stand it no longer. Won't you give me the benefit of the doubt?"

He could see the dusky oval of her cheek. It was carried high; and the thought stung him with pain that the high-blooded pride which stood between him and her now might be a holy thing once they were man and wife.

Before she could reply, the night air brought down to them horridly a woman's scream and a sudden turmoil of voices. They stopped, transfixed.

Out of the woodland came a running figure, and, seeing them, a man gasped: "A little lad is drowning—got the cramps—can you dive?"

Without a word Philbrick started down the shore.

The light was still strong enough when she reached the spot to distinguish figures. With a prayer on her lips, she stood among the stricken cottagers, and watched a tall figure, stripped to the waist, shoes off, dive repeatedly from the float, searching the dark waters for the white body of the drowning boy. As she watched, she prayed, "If he had given me the chance!"

Cries rose about her. The white figure shot and rose again and again from the dark water. He went down—would he never come up? "He's struck bottom," a hoarse voice said. The cry was enough. "No! no!" she found herself saying. All pride now was a trivial thing. Face to face with the issue, she knew she had forgiven what there was to forgive—that she loved him.

A wild shout from the float, a struggling in the water, and a small white object was lifted, then slowly, laboriously another that sagged into a heap on the platform.

* * * * * *

Philbrick opened his eyes in the Hammond cottage. After a dazed glance about he smiled. I hit something, but the kid is all right?" At Hammond's nod, he smiled. His eyes searched the room, and it was Hammond who understood again and not his wife. He leaned over and said into Philbrick's ear: "It's all right, old chap. Lilla has 'fessed up and old Jameson. He sent you here in hopes you two kids would make up. Now, I'm going to stand guard over the door while you make up; and, old man, I guess it won't be hard." He winked.

He opened the door. Philbrick, looking up, raised himself weakly at the sight of the slim, tense figure at the door. Only a moment did he wait, and then she came to him.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

"DO NOT FEAR; THAT STING IS GONE."

At first Violet did not even appear to swallow; but Wallace kept dropping a little of the liquid into her mouth, until the action of the throat told him that it was passing down, and, at the end of half-an-hour, it became evident that the nourishment was taking effect, for her pulse was stronger and her breathing more natural.

Still, consciousness did not return, and there was a terrible fear in every heart that she would never revive.

The officer came and touched Wallace gently on the shoulder after a time.

"I thought you didn't know the girl," he said, a look of inquiry in his eyes, for Wallace had represented her as a friend of Mr. Lawrence, but a stranger to him.

"Oh! I never suspected—but she is—my wife," the young man returned, with white lips.

The man's face was very sympathetic, but he was anxious to make his prisoner secure.

"You can leave her for a couple of minutes," he said; "let the woman tend her while you come down with me, in case this fellow should try to make me any trouble. I want to get him under lock and key; then I'll send the carriage back for you."

Wallace bent a searching look upon the woman. Her face was full of sympathy, her eyes rested upon Violet with a look of intense anxiety, and he believed she could be trusted.

"What are you here for?" he asked.

"He hired me to take care of her," she replied, indicating Wilhelm Mencke by a gesture.

"What was his object in keeping her here?"

"I don't know, sir; I was only to cook her meals and wait upon her. Let me feed her," she added, holding out her hand for the glass.

"Can I trust you? You haven't been giving her anything to make her like this?" Wallace questioned, sternly, a new and terrible fear taking possession of him.

"Oh, no, sir," and the woman recoiled, with a look of horror on her white face that reassured him. "I wouldn't harm a hair of her head—indeed, you may trust me—I will warm the milk, and it will be likely to do her more good. I only wish I had thought of the brandy before."

Wallace yielded his post to her, and preceded the officer and his prisoner down-stairs, where they found the carriage waiting.

Wilhelm Mencke was inclined to resist getting into it, but another twist at the nippers convinced him that it would be unwise for him to exhibit much of his stubborn spirit, and he stepped into the vehicle, followed by his custodian, and was driven away, while Wallace returned to his charge up-stairs.

"She is really coming around, sir," was Sarah's greeting, as he entered the room.

As Wallace bent down to smooth the tangled hair from Violet's brow, her white lids slowly opened, and the beautiful blue eyes of his loved one looked once more into his.

Wallace thought he must break down utterly as he met that gaze—a long, loving, earnest gaze it was, too—and he trembled so that he was obliged to drop into the chair which Sarah thoughtfully set for him beside the bed.

A faint smile began to hover about Violet's lips, and he wondered that she did not seem surprised or agitated to find him there.

"Wallace!" she whispered, after a moment.

"Yes, love."

"I knew you would come to meet me."

He thought she was wandering, and did not reply, but took one of her hands in a fond clasp.

"I thought I was dying," she went on, in a weak, dreamy tone, "and I didn't care much—I was so unhappy. I am glad now, for nothing can ever separate us again."

"Good gracious, sir; she thinks she is dead, I do believe!" Sarah exclaimed, in an astonished whisper.

Wallace made a gesture enjoining her to be silent, then he said, softly:

"No, darling, nothing shall separate us now."

He began to feed her again with the warm milk and brandy, and she took it with some show of hunger, only once she glanced from the spoon up into his face and murmured:

"How queer!" and he knew that she was still only partially conscious, and imagined herself and him both in the other world, while it had occurred to her as strange that he should be feeding her.

She was still very weak, and presently she dropped off into a gentle, natural slumber.

She slept for more than an hour.

The carriage came meanwhile, but Wallace bade the driver wait, he would not disturb the beloved sleeper in her strengthening repose.

During this time he drew Sarah out of the room, and questioned her closely.

The woman told him truthfully all that she knew regarding Violet's capture and imprisonment, and he was convinced that she was in no way responsible for what had occurred, but had on the other hand been as much of a friend to her as she had dared to be. He also learned that, immediately after Violet's recapture, Mrs. Mencke had hurried off to Cincinnati, but he could gain no clue to the object of her journey.

Sarah begged that he would not allow her to be arrested as an accomplice of Wilhelm Mencke, and told him of her crippled child at home, who was dependent upon her, and he assured her that she should not be; but told her that she must hold herself in readiness to testify against her employer when his case came to trial.

Their conversation was interrupted by a slight sound from within the room, and they hastened back to their patient, to find her awake and half sitting up, supported upon one elbow.

"Oh, Sarah! I dreamed——" she began, then catching sight of Wallace behind the woman, she cried out in a voice that was tremulous with love, and joy, and wonder:

"It was no dream! Oh, Wallace! Wallace!"

He knelt beside her, opening his arms, and she threw herself upon his breast, sobbing in utter abandonment.

"Go," Wallace said, in a husky tone to Sarah, and she stole noiselessly out of the room, wiping the tears that streamed from her eyes.

We, too, are shut out from those first moments of reunion, for they are too sacred for any human eye to witness. Only that long-parted husband and wife will ever know how solemn, yet joyous, was that hour, when they realized that they had been given back to each other from the dead, as it were.

At last Wallace called to Sarah to prepare Violet another glass of milk, and the woman added a beaten egg to it, feeling sure that the girl's recent comatose state had been chiefly produced by mental depression and the lack of nourishment, rather than by any bodily ailment.

Violet drank it eagerly, but without releasing her hold upon Wallace's hand, for it almost seemed to her that he would again vanish from her sight if she let go of him.

"Now, my darling," Wallace said, when she had disposed of it all, "I want you to have Sarah dress you warmly, then I am going to take you home, if you think you can endure the ride. Mr. Lawrence, I know, is terribly anxious, and will begin to think I have failed to find you, it is getting so late. Are you strong enough, do you think?"

"Yes, indeed; and, oh! I shall be so glad to get away from this dreadful place," Violet answered, with a shivering sigh.

It was not an easy task for her, however, to dress, for she was still exceedingly weak, and panted breathlessly with every exertion; but finally she was ready, and Wallace, gathering her slight form in his arms, carried her down, and laid her upon some pillows in the carriage. He then went back and locked Mrs. Mencke's door, leaving word with the family below that she would find her key at the nearest police station. Then he handed Sarah a ten-dollar note, and took her address, saying that he would see her again in a few days.

After this the newly united husband and wife were driven directly to Mr. Lawrence's residence on Fifth Avenue.

That gentleman was overjoyed when he learned that Violet was once more safe beneath his roof, while it would be difficult to depict his amazement upon learning that Wallace was the husband of his fair protegee.

Wallace had insisted that Violet should go directly to bed upon her arrival home, and, after she had partaken of a nourishing little repast, which Mrs. Davis prepared with her own hands, she fell into a refreshing slumber which lasted far into the evening.

During this time Wallace conversed with Mr. Lawrence, and read Violet's letter, which had come to light after his departure in the morning, and through this learned the reason of Wilhelm Mencke's abduction of her, and the probable object of Mrs. Mencke's journey to Cincinnati.

When Violet awoke he questioned her further about the matter, when he comprehended more clearly the plot against her.

Early the next morning he telegraphed to Ralph Middleton the message to stop all proceedings regarding the Huntington fortune, and then wrote immediately, relating the romantic story of Violet's adventures, and promising to bring her to Cincinnati to claim her inheritance as soon as she was able to travel.

Her recent trying experience had told fearfully upon her, and she was obliged to keep her bed for several days. She could not even see Mr. Lawrence, although she would have been glad to go to him, and she was shocked when she learned of his injuries and narrow escape from death.

So Wallace had to be the bearer of messages between the two sick-rooms, but it was a pleasant task, and one in which he took especial delight.

"My dear fellow, I can never express my joy in the knowledge that you are Violet's husband," Mr. Lawrence remarked, the day after the wonderful reunion. "Yours is the most romantic story, out of a novel, that I ever knew of; and now that she has come back to me, you must make this your home also."

"You are certainly very kind, Mr. Lawrence," Wallace began, flushing; "but——"

"There—there, don't let us have any 'buts' nor any objections," said Mr. Lawrence, interrupting him. "Violet, to all intents and purposes, is my adopted daughter; my will was made some time ago, and half of all that I possess is left exclusively to her; the—other half will go to—my nearest of kin"—this last with a keen glance at Wallace, who, however, did not appear to suspect that he was his nearest of kin. "Now be reasonable, Wallace," he pleaded, seeing that the young man still hesitated from a feeling of independence; "this house and all there is in it will some time belong to Violet; I am a lonely old man who enjoys young company, so stay, both of you, and be my children."

"Well, then, for the present, since you so much desire it, we will stay perhaps until the nearest of kin present themselves," Wallace replied, smiling as he warmly clasped the hand that the invalid held out to him, while he wondered a little what caused the mischievous twinkle in his eyes.

Wallace had been absent from his office for two days, and when, upon the morning of the third, he presented himself there again, he found Lord Cameron before him, making anxious inquiries regarding his prolonged absence.

Wallace at once drew him into his private office and locked the door.

"Where have you been, Richardson?" his lordship inquired. "I have literally haunted both your office and your lodgings during the last forty-eight hours, but no one could tell me anything about you; and—Jove! what has happened to you?" he interposed, as he searched his friend's eager, glowing face, and remarked his animated, joyous manner. "I should think you had taken a fresh pull at the 'Elixir of Life.'"

"I have," said Wallace, laughing out gaily in his new-found happiness; "and, Cameron, Love is the elixir of life, isn't it?"

"Y—es. And now Lord Cameron looked sharply at him.

Could this smiling, animated face belong to the same man who so recently had told him that "his heart was dead"—that he "could never love again in this world"?

Wallace saw that his friend was sorely perplexed by the change in him, and he grew grave at once.

"Cameron, what, to you, would seem the most wonderful thing that could happen in the world?" he asked.

"I should as soon think that Violet could come back to earth as that you could fall in love," the young earl answered, still regarding him fixedly.

Wallace lost some of his unusual color at this unexpected reply.

"How strange that you should have thought of that!" he said.

"That I should have thought of what?" demanded Lord Cameron, looking a trifle annoyed. "You deal in enigmas this morning."

"Of Violet coming back to earth," said Wallace.

"I did not think of her coming back; I only said that would not seem much more wonderful than that you should fall in love, after all that you have so recently said."

"I could never love any but the girl whom I made—my wife, Cameron," Wallace returned, in a voice that quavered slightly; "and now be prepared for a shock, my friend, for I do not know how to break my tidings any other way—Violet has come back to me!"

"Wallace! you must know that is impossible! Are you crazy?" cried his companion, seizing him by the arm and searching his face with the greatest anxiety, while his own grew very pale.

"No, I am not crazy, although I can hardly wonder that you should fear it," said the young man. "My friend, do not look so incredulous, for I have told you only the truth. Violet has really come back to me; she never died—it was all a terrible mistake; and, oh, Cameron, I believe I am the happiest mortal living at this moment."

There was no mistaking the ring of truth and sincerity in the young man's tones, and, though Lord Cameron could not wholly credit the statement that Wallace had made, he felt sure that something very wonderful must have occurred to have thus changed the hitherto sorrowing, hopeless young man into this eager, buoyant, joy-beaming lover.

"Sit down, Richardson," he said, with all the calmness that he could assume, "and, if you can talk connectedly, and intelligibly, tell me what your strange words mean. Have you turned spiritualist?—have you seen a materialized spirit? You surely cannot expect me to believe that Violet Huntington is here in New York City, in bodily presence?"

Here is a hint that may help someone. When our teacher gave an exhibition and the ladies around gave a pie supper, to buy a stove for the church, I made some cooky or gingerbread men. They sold like the proverbial hot cakes, some going as high as thirty-five cents a pair. Any good cooky recipe with ginger added will do and a little practice will enable you to shape the men far better than I can tell you.

Best wishes to all.

MRS. PEARLIE GRAHAM.

CALIFORNIA.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I am five feet, seven inches tall, dark brown hair, hazel eyes and some freckles. Am twenty-two years of age and have been married seven years and have three children, the oldest being five and the youngest two and one half years. I do all my own washing, ironing and sewing. We live on a farm and as hubby works out I have everything to look out for and it keeps me rather busy.

I must tell you about my kitchen. It had a dark brown linoleum on the floor, wainscotting was dark brown and everything to match so it was rather a dreary place. I bought some cream paint and when hubby got time he painted the woodwork a cream color with tan trimming. I also had my old wooden sink torn down and a white enamel one put in its place. I saved my apple money and got a grey, cream-and-green checked linoleum for my floor and a white oilcloth for my table. With white curtains at my windows and a few plants in blossom my kitchen is a lovely place in which to work. Of course a light kitchen means a little more work but it is so much more pleasant I don't mind that. Another thing, how many sisters have a small wood stove with an oven that won't bake or that burns everything? Go without that new dress and save the money for a real stove. It needs very little more fuel and think of the comfort of having perfect bread, cake and pies, without watching the oven every minute.

Why squabble about money? Hubby and I set aside a certain amount each month and the rest is put into the family purse to be used as we need it. We both feel free to help ourselves. I was inclined to be a bit extravagant with the small change so I began to keep an account book. I enter everything I spend and by knowing that I will feel ashamed of myself for a silly item.

How many of you make the bottoms of hubby's shirts into little garments? I do. I make underwaists, drawers and even petticoats of them. They last almost as long as new ones and think of the saving. It doesn't take very long to make them.

Best wishes and the best of health for the whole COMFORT family.

A YOUNG MOTHER.

Young Mother, and others.—While we're beautifying the kitchen let's not forget the pantry. I saw one just the other day that filled my heart with longing. It was such a beautiful pantry. The color scheme was in keeping with the kitchen and there were earthenware jars, all alike, but in different sizes, to hold the various dry goods and sugar while for the spice and everything nice there were smaller jars, all alike, and neatly labeled. All this grandeur was in a new house with new furnishings, and a new mistress, but the majority of us have to use in our pantries the jars and tins that seems like we've always had and we don't know just where we got them or why, but after all's said and done, a spick and span pantry covers a multitude of odds and ends in the way of containers.—Ed.

MT. AIRY, R. R. 3, N. C.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I am the oldest girl of ten children, so you see there is quite a crowd of us. I am eighteen years old and only five feet, two inches tall and weigh 106 pounds. When I was a baby and could just begin to pull up to things, one cold winter day mother built a good fire and sat me and my little brother down on the floor and told us to sit there while she went out to do up the chores. While she was gone I crawled over to the fire, pulled myself up to the wall and got the poker and began punching the fire, when over I went into it. My head was burned quite badly and my hands were almost baked. They did all they could for me and I got well though the scars are on my hands now and my fingers are grown together quite a ways down. I have thought for some time about writing to this corner to see if any of the sisters know of anything that would take the scars away. I would be so glad if I knew a way.

My love to you and and all the sisters.

Your friend, EFFIE MOSLEY.

TEXAS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Please admit a young man into your corner? I will not be as fussy as Bachelor Bill but wish to say a few words in defense of that glorious and beautiful thing called Home. Most of my letter will be in reply to B. of Goshen, California. B. seems to think that a smart and well-educated woman is throwing herself away when she marries and undertakes to raise a family. She seems to think that the little "four walls" of a home are too small for any intellectual woman to waste her time in. But if she would just stop and think a while she would see that the four walls of a home make the four walls of a nation. Too many women in the last few years have considered home life as a very small matter, a kind of side line, you know, and the result can be found in the ever increasing divorce court record. B. also mentioned the divorce record but she didn't name the cause, One great reason of so much discord in the homes of today has been caused by mothers teaching their daughters that home life is too small for brains. The young men and young women are losing all desire for a home. They can see too many things that appeal to their fancy away from home.

Mrs. Wilkinson is indeed doing a great work and she is a woman of sense and education but she will also tell us that she is not so high that she does not ever find a puzzle in home life. Now don't you, Mrs. Wilkinson?

B. would have us believe that there is no room for service in such a little place as home. What greater service can a woman do than bring a life into the world and guide that life from babyhood to manhood or womanhood in such way that her own flesh and blood is a blessing and an uplift to humanity.

There is not a person under the canopy of Heaven who considers the training of a human life as a small matter and where have we all received our first outlook on life? Who gave us our first impressions of life's burden? Mother did. Our first teacher was mother but still B. says the four walls of the home are too small for a woman of intellect. What do you married sisters say to that? Do any of you who have brought little lives into this world feel that you are so highly educated that you could do more for the world if you were single again? And now don't each and every one of you mothers feel that you do not know as much as you should to guide that little life entrusted to you along life's way? I feel sure that all mothers feel that they are too small for the great undertaking of raising their little ones, yet B. says a woman of caliber should not confine herself to a home and family.

Once a large number of attorneys met in a near-by city and during the meeting this question was asked, "What is the most essential to a nation's welfare?" Of all things it was decided that home and home training was the most essential. "Without home," said one of these great men, "our every institution would soon crumble to decay." He continued, "Without that training at home of love and sacrifice, governments would soon go to ruin and all peoples would descend back to the dark ages." Again we all remember reading this, "A nation's morals cannot grow above its home life." And as the morals are at home, so will the nation be. So you see that when a woman of large caliber confines herself to the "four walls" of home and family, she is doing the greatest service for humanity that can be rendered.

Girls, don't get the impression that you can find more real happiness and do more for humanity at large by going out in the world and facing life's problems alone. God never intended that and a normal woman's mind finally turns to home and little mites of humanity to sit on her knee and croon, "My own dear Mother." After all, what is the need of asking the reason for this, the reason is because God intended it so.

Is a woman a slacker who does not bring life into the world? She may not be a slacker but she is many times a mourner. She often thinks that she might have grasped the blessing God offered her, but, "The saddest words of tongue or pen are these, it might have been."

I hope I do not pull down the wrath of anyone upon my head and if Mrs. Wilkinson gives me a welcome I will come again and next time my subject will be morals, past, present and future prospects. That is my favorite study and my hopes are to be able to offer some line of improvement, or at least some help.

Enthusiastically for COMFORT, HOME LOVER.

NORTHERN MAINE.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have not seen many letters from our old Pine Tree State, nor have I read that any of the sisters wish to hear about it although such requests have been made to those living in some of the southern and western states.

I have read COMFORT since I can remember and I think it could not have a better name. It was only lately that I began to read the Sisters' Corner and I know now how much I have missed. When I read the different letters I feel somewhat acquainted with a lot of people of whom I had never heard about.

I have noticed that some of the happier wives do not exactly approve of "airing one's troubles," as one of them expressed it, but I wonder if they forgot that all of us are not made alike. Some feel far better by telling about their troubles and getting advice, while others shrink from the very thought of it.

I do not see, now, why I have not been stirred before, by the appeals to increase Uncle Charlie's Home Fund, but after reading recent letters in COMFORT I feel that I must send my bit, and I am mailing it in this letter. I think Uncle Charlie is a wonderful man and he deserves a beautiful home. Judging from some of the letters, many of the "bits" come from those whose dollars are none too plentiful (and that is my case).

I have brown hair, grey eyes and a light complexion. I am five feet, four inches tall and weigh one hundred and eight pounds.

Best wishes to all.

IRENE.

SAN ANTONIO, 419 Hicks Ave., TEXAS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON, SISTERS AND BROTHERS:

Yes, the time has come when we may as well add brothers for they will crowd in occasionally to peek over our shoulders to see what we are doing and now brothers and sisters, do you know what we are planning on for this summer? Reading Pearl Vesey's camping experience isn't going to discourage us even if we too are told to move on. We've planned and planned to take a little vacation each year but something has always happened to prevent so this is to be a dozen vacations in one. First we expect to go from here to Oklahoma, then on to Ohio and Michigan and then through the northwest to Seattle, then on down to southern California. Now won't that be fine? And don't you wish that you could go along?

I thought at first that I would try and write our experiences so all could enjoy the trip with us but I realize it would take up too much space and I'm not a gifted writer, but just the ordinary sort that would delight in giving you a bouquet of flowers but could not describe their beauty to you. Such being the case, it would be fine if we could look ahead and say "We're most to Blankville or some other village or city, and COMFORT Sister or Brother So and So lives there," and when at last we sight the farm or town and give three honks—that will be our signal—Sister So and So will come running out to greet us, wiping her hands on her apron for she was mixing bread and Mr. So and So drops his hoe and comes forward rather reluctantly, wondering what them folks want.

Joshua says to me, "Betsey, didn't I tell you this was a fool thing to do? The world is full of people, even this very road is filled with cars." "Yes, I know," I interrupt, "but they're not all COMFORT people and they don't stop and say 'Howdy.'" The good sister grasps my hand and I give hers a good squeeze back again and her John sets his hoe by the gatepost and comes and looks the car over and asks about the trip and the men are soon discussing cars like they used to horses. In the meantime Mrs. So and So and the rest of us are exchanging canning recipes and we admire the children who have followed Pa and Ma to see who's come. Then we show them the scenes and other kodak pictures we have taken on the trip and then with an "If you ever come our way drop in and see us," we wave a good by and soon pass on out of sight. Joshua says, "Them were nice friendly people. Who's next on your list?" Said the wife at home, "I asked and asked them to come in and rest but they just got a drink and filled their water jug; that was all, and wasn't them nice pictures, etc."

We're not "cousining," but it is pleasant to stop and have a glad handshake.

How many would like to have us stop a wee bit of a while in case we might come your way? Then send us your address.

I intended to write something helpful, particularly for the shut-ins and those sad at heart, for I realize this is rather personal, but will postpone it until after our trip, which we expect will be during the months of July, August and September.

Much love to all.

Your affectionate sister, BETSEY BETTEYS.

Sorry, Betsey, your letter wasn't received in time for an earlier issue but this is the best we can do. Next best to making the trip with you and meeting the sisters in person will be hearing about it from you.—Ed.

KENTUCKY.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I enjoy reading the sisters' letters as I get so many helpful hints from them. I notice one subject is being rather overlooked. While you are trying to keep your boys at home, what about your girls? Most girls around the age of twelve or thirteen want a room. They want one they can claim as their own and if by any means you can afford an extra room, let them have it. Let them know in a way that isn't a command that they are expected to keep it neat and clean and in order. Give them certain household duties to attend to and after they have finished let them read or play. Give them a certain sum of money weekly, if it isn't more than twenty-five cents, to be spent as they want to. Board and clothes isn't enough. They need a certain allowance for their personal needs and if you don't give it to them they will leave home and go to work as soon as they are old enough. Aren't our girls worth more to us than money?

Think this over and let me know your opinions.

Wishing COMFORT a long life, I remain, IRISH.

Irish.—If all girls take the interest in their room that I did in my first "all-to-myself" room it would be advisable for the mothers to have furniture that could be moved easily and woodwork that would stand a weekly cleaning for I'm positive that I cleaned mine that often and rearranged the furniture. Even a very small room means a lot to a girl if it is all her own.—Ed.

LOUISIANA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I haven't a thing of importance to say, only that I am a happy wife, a mother of five and some say a successful wife and mother. I married at sixteen and have never regretted it; however, I don't advocate early marriages as they don't all prove as happy as mine. The only regret I have for marrying so early is that I didn't finish my education.

I have read many letters from COMFORT readers of life on the farm but I always had a little doubtful feeling about farm life, but now I have tried it for nearly a year and our farm life has been ideal. We have a farm of 600 acres in cultivation and about 160 in wood. We are four miles from a town of 3,000 population and the roads are excellent. There hasn't been a day we couldn't go to town in the car. Our little home is new and I have planted lots of flowers. We have three near neighbors, all very nice people, so I haven't been lonesome one minute.

Will someone send in some good names for a farm as we must name ours. I like to hear a farm called by an appropriate name but can't get my wits together to pick one out.

CHARMIAN CLAYTON, FOUR YEARS OLD.

I must tell you something about my children—they are such dear youngsters (isn't that just like a mother?) My oldest are twins, eleven years old. Their names are Enneta and Endelle. Beverly Gay is nine, Keith is six and my baby, Charmian, whose picture I am sending to Mrs. Wilkinson, is four.

Sisters, I will whisper a secret into your ears. If you expect to keep your children's love and confidence when they are out in the world, be a companion to them when they are small. I know one poor old mother who says she can't claim the love of her daughters who are grown and out in the world. They never write to her and seldom come home and then only as a duty and not because they want to. She says they never offer to kiss her or show any affection for her and the poor old soul's heart is nearly breaking now. I hope and pray I shall never live to see one of my children treat me in this way; but that isn't all I do. I have made myself a confidant and companion of each child. I know their dispositions and treat each in a different way. I rarely have to punish them and they are considered well-behaved by the people around here. They are not saints but healthy, normal children and they get into mischief lots of times.

I want to say a word about children's teeth as I saw something in a recent COMFORT along that line. I carry my children twice yearly to a good dentist and have their teeth looked over. The first teeth should be well cared for if the second are expected to be sound. I have also taught each child to brush his teeth twice daily and it has become a fixed habit; they would no more go to school in the morning without brushing their teeth than they would go without combing their hair.

With best wishes and love to all the sisters,

HAPPY MOTHER.

ILLINOIS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

May I have a little talk with you in behalf of COMFORT's brothers and sisters? I often read the sisters' letters as my mother takes COMFORT and I think they are interesting.

A lady who signs herself "E" seems to be worried because she has been divorced and would like to hear from her brothers on that subject. She wants to know if men can have the same love and respect for a divorced woman they would for an unmarried woman. Yes, they can. Why not? If you are the innocent party (and people will know whether you are or not) men will love and respect you just the same as though you had never been married. But if you are the guilty one then men might shun you. But I don't believe you are the guilty one for you take the matter too seriously. You think that a woman is ashamed to be placed in your position. A good woman might feel ashamed but an evil one would just laugh it away. I have been divorced, but was not the guilty party as my friends know. You must cheer up and keep young. While you have love in your heart, keep it there. We are as old as our heart is. If sorrow is in our hearts we grow old. If love is there we keep young. Go out with friends and enjoy yourself, if you feel like it. Get on your wraps and let's you and I take a walk down the lane. Mrs. Wilkinson lives down there where you see that nice apple orchard. I know she will be glad to see us. By the way, E, did you know that the brothers and sisters are going to have a surprise party on Mrs. Wilkinson tomorrow night? Well, we are. We are to meet at sister Pearl Vesey's home, with our ice cream and cake, and all go over to Mrs. Wilkinson's home together. You be ready and I will call for you and we'll go to the party together. ILLINOIS BROTHER.

Illinois Brother.—If it were only possible for the sisters and brothers to have a surprise party "on" me it would be my idea of a good time. To be sure, you might find me working in my garden, as I sometimes do in the cool o' the evening but nearly every one of you knows what that means so nobody would mind if my hands and nails were somewhat laden with good honest soil. There'd be that much more of me to welcome you, my dears, as the wolf told Little Red Riding Hood—only I'll promise not to eat you. —Ed.

NEBRASKA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have been a reader of COMFORT for years and enjoy the sisters' letters very much. Some are very amusing.

I am an old maid but I never resent the name. A speaker at the Chautauqua last fall called us "Community Angels," but I prefer the name of old maid. I am happy to be one. I know there are some, even grass widows, who look on us with pity. With taking care of my mother and my flowers I have plenty to keep me busy.

I attended a county fair last fall and there I saw a woman going along pushing a baby carriage and leading another child, with one or two more clinging to her skirts and I wondered where her John was and when I looked over to the race track, and saw the fence lined with men, I thought to myself, "He is having a good time and never giving a thought to his wife and children." Then I could say with the Pharisee, "Thank the Lord I am not as some other people."

What authors do the sisters like best? I admire Harold Bell Wright and Ralph Connor.

Maybe someone would care to know what I look like. I am five feet, four inches tall, with brown curly hair blue eyes, a pug nose and am so old I don't dare tell.

If I see this in print I will come again. BETH.

WILKINSON, IND.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have been a silent reader of COMFORT for over twenty years. I wrote you a letter at that time and it was published. I was a young girl then but now I am the mother of two boys and a girl living and one little flower that God plucked from our home and transplanted it in His garden above.

Sadie E. W. P., I agree with you about helping others. We have no better example of our Savior's life on earth than by forgetting self in the joy of help-

"Yes I do—just that. I have held her in these arms; her own have clasped my neck; her lips have pressed mine. I have looked into her dear eyes. I have heard her speak."

"Richardson! truly, I am losing patience with you; what strange hallucination is this? It cannot be possible, when I saw Violet dead and in her casket—when you yourself have looked upon her grave at Mentone!" sternly returned Lord Cameron, who really began to fear that his friend's mind had been unhinged by long grief.

"It was all a mistake," reiterated Wallace, "and, Vane——" with a sudden thought—"don't you remember that last day in London when I saw that face in a passing carriage, and how it startled me by its strange resemblance to my darling?"

"Yes," and Lord Cameron started.

"Well, that was Violet herself!—she was on her way to the Midland grand station to take the train for Glasgow. The body that was buried at Mentone was that of a poor peasant girl."

And then Wallace proceeded to relate Violet's history from the time of her flight from the hotel up to the time of his finding her two days previous.

Lord Cameron listened amazed. The story seemed too strange, too unreasonable to be true; but told in detail as it was, he was compelled to believe it.

The strong man was deeply moved also by the memories it revived, for he had truly loved the beautiful girl and had sincerely mourned her supposed untimely death.

His wonder was gradually supplanted by a feeling of profound gratitude that she had escaped the terrible fate which every one supposed had overtaken her.

He sincerely rejoiced also that Wallace, whom he regarded almost in the light of a dear brother, would once more be happy—that his life would not be the broken, hopeless existence, which he had feared he must henceforth lead.

He believed, too, that he could look upon his future happiness with Violet as calmly, and in as friendly a spirit, as if she had been a cherished sister, instead of the woman whom he had once hoped to marry.

He was somewhat surprised, as he secretly tried to analyze his own feelings, at the change that had come over him of late, and he was sure that the affection which he had conceived for the beautiful girl, whom he had recently chosen to be his wife, was as deep, and pure, and tender—if it had not quite the ardor of a first-passion in it—as that which he had once bestowed upon Violet.

"Wallace, I never was so grateful for anything in my life as I am for this wonderful news," he said, earnestly, when the young husband concluded his story. "I am personally thankful for the preservation of Violet's life, and I rejoice, with all my heart, with you, in the great happiness that will henceforth be yours and hers."

Wallace turned, and looked gravely into his friend's eyes.

Lord Cameron met his glance, frankly and smilingly.

"Do not fear," he said; "there is no sting in this for me—that is all gone, and my future with the woman whom I truly love—whom every day I am growing to reverence and admire more and more—will be all the happier for knowing that your life will be perfected in this union, which I believe was ordained in heaven."

The two friends clasped hands, while each felt assured that the bond of friendship between them was stronger than it had ever been before, and when that cordial clasp relaxed, there were tears upon the cheeks of both.

Better Stock and Better Prices

GRAIN and labor are so expensive these days that no one can afford to keep scrub stock any longer, and this is the best time of the year to start improving, as most large poultry farms will sell young cockerels in the fall much cheaper than later in the season. A well-bred hen costs less to feed than a mongrel because she is properly proportioned and constituted, and so utilizes the food given her that she is always in good condition. The mongrel, being a mixture of several breeds, the food she consumes goes first to make form, then fat; but rarely, if ever, is she in perfect condition either as a fryer or roaster, and as an egg producer she is never profitable.

Many of my correspondents seem to think that the only advantage of keeping pure-bred stock lies in having pretty things to look at, and the extra price which their eggs may bring for setting. All this is a mistake. Pure-bred birds are the best for market and eggs, because, as I have said before, they have no counteracting characteristics to overcome, so are always fresh and dress well at all ages; and after they stop growing, every scrap of food over and above what they need to keep up to their normal condition is converted into eggs. A pure-bred chicken, when nine weeks of age, will have a compact and well-proportioned form, plump breast and thighs, and weigh from a pound and a half to two pounds, where the mongrel of the same age will be long of limb, large boned, with protruding breast bone, and not half the amount of flesh.

The careful study and observation which big poultrymen and agricultural colleges have given to the subject of egg production during the last fifteen years, have proved conclusively that the male bird has more influence in building up a strain of heavy layers than the females, which is a point not generally known.

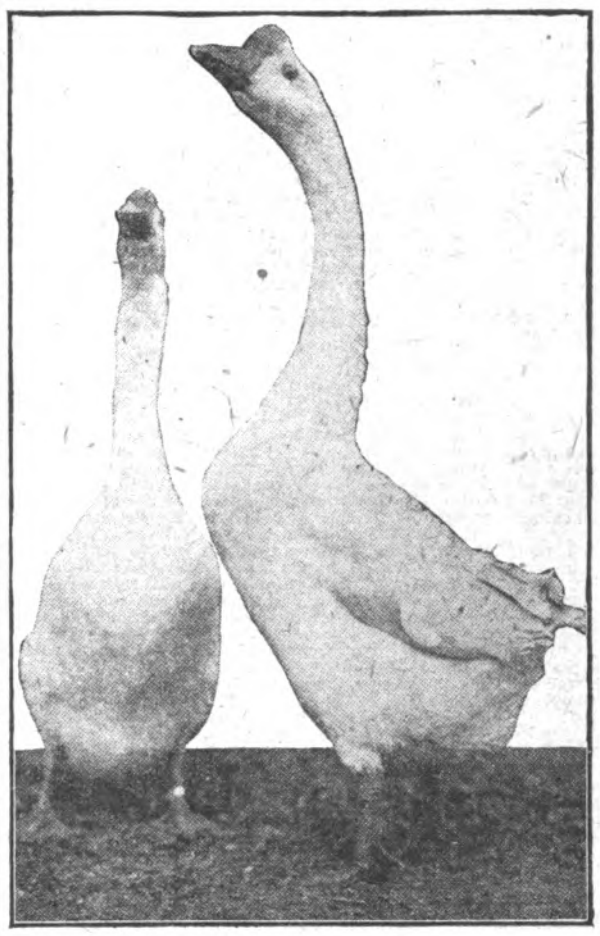
The average person selects the best layers in the flock for the breeding pen, and then spoils everything by selecting a cheap male bird whose appearance pleases, without knowing about the characteristics of the stock he came from. Many letters I receive tell me that the writers began two or three years ago with good birds, and had splendid luck for the first and second years, but that the egg yield had dwindled down to almost nothing, though they feed just the same as before, and change roosters every year. This last sentence is just where the trouble lies. They started with good birds which had been bred specially for egg production, then mated them to a new rooster each year without any knowledge of the egg-laying qualities of his maternal ancestors. Naturally, the pullets from such a mating are inferior layers. To get good pullets which will mature early and lay well, the father bird must come from a family of heavy layers. This is of much greater importance than the number of eggs laid by the mother of the pullet.

Farmers have grasped this point pretty generally about cows, but they haven't awakened to the fact that the same principle applies to poultry, yet the rooster had as much influence with the number of eggs the pullet laid as the bull has had with the milk yield of the coming heifers.

Many of you have been reading this department for years and asking my advice, and hundreds have acknowledged that I have been able to help you, so why not take my advice on the subject of getting good male birds? Sell off some of your old hens or poor young stock and buy a good cockerel from a poultryman who knows his business and mates his birds for practical results. Of course, such a man can't sell his birds for one or two dollars apiece. It has taken him time to establish a flock of birds with records behind them, and it can only be accomplished through experience and years of constant culling and the use of trap nests, which means lots of extra work watching the nests and releasing the hens after they have laid, but it is the only way, and the breeder can surely know each hen's value as an egg producer.

I visited a poultry plant not long ago, where trap nests had been in use for ten years. In each of the laying houses a chart was kept, and when the pullets were put in the house in September, bands were put on their legs and the number of the band was entered on the chart. All through the season a man goes through the houses every two hours from 8 A. M. to 4 P. M., taking the hens from the trap nests and entering their numbers on the records so that the owner can look back for ten years and see the record of every hen for several generations.

At the end of the first year the best layers are separated and mated to roosters hatched from eggs laid by equally good layers, and after ten years of such work it was found that the hen of heavy egg yield never produced a daughter which was as good an egg producer as herself, but that the cockerels produced from her eggs always gave her great egg-producing power to their daughters. So you see it is the productiveness of your male birds' mothers and grandmothers that really count, and as it costs heavily to put in trap nests and pay the extra help to watch them and keep records, you can't expect to get cockerels from such stock for less than ten dollars apiece, and remember that if you mate one such bird to seven hens you are pretty sure to get a hundred pullets from the mating, and if their egg-producing power is only improved one per cent, the sale of the extra eggs the first season will more than pay the purchase price of the sire, besides improving your stock for several generations.



The second season use the same bird to head a pen of five of his own pullets, and mate the seven original hens to the brightest and strongest looking of his sons and you will have a flock of heavy layers. Disabuse your mind of the idea that pure-bred birds are only for looks, and to win prizes at shows, and realize that they are the only practical money-making birds, because they lay more eggs and bring more per pound when dressed for market. And remember, also, that you only want male birds for breeding pens.

Pullets and hens being kept only for market eggs should have no male birds with them, as infertile eggs are preferred for eating. There is no danger of infertile eggs ever developing a blood spot, due to embryo development. Due to the absence of a fertile germ, they withstand heat much better than the fertile egg. During shipments, especially during the winter, it is often that the crates are exposed to considerable heat when they are placed near the steam pipes in the express car or office, and again they are allowed to remain on the platform for a considerable time on cold days and exposed to a low temperature. In the case of fertile eggs the intense heat would cause the embryo to develop beyond its normal resting stage, while the following exposure to cold would cause the death of the developing embryo, which would result in a blood spot. An infertile egg will stand shipment remarkably well under peculiarly adverse conditions which must be expected in a greater or less degree where large quantities of eggs are handled at all seasons of the year and over great distances. Again, infertile eggs are much easier to preserve. It is a common practice to put thousands of dozens of eggs in cold storage when the price is low and the supply abundant for use in the winter months when the supply is limited and the price high. Infertile eggs stand this storage and come out much better than fertile eggs. It is often the case that private families desire to preserve a limited number of eggs for their own use in the winter, and they are usually put down in water glass or salicylate of soda. The infertile eggs are found to be far superior for home preservation to the fertile eggs. The infertile are much slower to decay. There is an old saying that "where there is no life there can be no death," and with the infertile egg there has been no union of male and female germ cells, hence there is no possibility of such eggs becoming decayed or rotten except as they are handled under very adverse conditions. Infertile eggs are much easier to produce and cost less than fertile eggs, due to the fact that no male birds are required in the pen, and it is a fact that just as many infertile eggs are produced from a given pen as there would have been if a male bird had been present.

This being the case, it seems foolish to keep a lot of useless male birds running with the whole flock. Sell them off, and buy one or two good cockerels to mate with your best stock next spring, and so establish a profitable flock of thoroughbred birds.

The really big money in the poultry business comes from selling eggs and stock for breeding, and it should be the aim of every poultry dealer who has gleaned experience from practical work to establish a flock of really fine birds. I started with common stock, because when I commenced I hadn't the capital to purchase anything better, but from the first I studied the principles of mating, and at about the end of three years, when my poultry was paying well, I determined to start out with a higher class stock, which would enable me to get big prices for eggs and birds. I bought a trio which had won first prize at the New York Poultry Show. They cost seventy dollars, which seemed an awful price for just three birds, and I felt guilty until results justified the extravagance.

Rearing prize birds is one of the most profitable and interesting branches of husbandry, but to succeed you must have knowledge to work on. The beginner is usually convinced that two perfect looking creatures of any sort or kind will produce their like, but unfortunately such is not the case. A bird's ancestors have more influence on its progeny than the individuality of the bird itself. For that reason it is necessary to know the characteristics of the ancestral progenitors of the bird that you desire to cultivate, so that the signs of reverted heredity can be recognized at once and intelligently combatted by the next season's mating.

E. A.—It is very difficult to get rid of the small house mites when they once get established. If you have a spraying outfit for fruit trees, fill it with very strong insect killer, and thoroughly spray the inside of the house, every third day for two weeks. If you have no spraying outfit, use plenty of whitewash. Mix a quarter of a pound of powdered glue with every pail of whitewash. Slake the lime, using just enough water to start it boiling; then thin down with boiling skimmilk. The wash should be much thicker than for ordinary whitewash, and applied whilst hot. Use a stiff whiskbroom, and swish as much as possible into all the cracks and crevices, for these are the places where the mites congregate and breed.

L. C.—Broody hens and setting hens are very likely to get sick if fed on all sorts of food. They should have nothing but whole corn, which digests easily, and so the intestines do not become overcharged with waste material. A bird's instinct prevents her from leaving the nest more than once in twenty-four hours, and as a bird will not soil her nest when she can possibly help it, waste matter retained in the intestines irritates and causes disease.

B. M.—Lice and improper food have caused the trouble. Please read answers to L. C. and E. A., and as you know the hens are infested with lice, you had better powder them before setting, every third night up to the fifteenth day.

E. G.—I think you fed the goslings too soon and too heavily. They should not have anything to eat for forty-eight hours. After that time we give them stale bread moistened with milk, squeezed dry and mixed with an equal quantity of green oat sprouts, which are cut into short lengths. To this mixture is added one tablespoonful of sharp sand or part gravel, or powdered charcoal. About half-a-cupful is given to five goslings five times a day for the first week, and during that time they are confined in a small yard, which is movable. We keep them on short grass, and move the yard each day. After a week they are allowed night and day, and fed only twice a day. We use a mash made of ground oats and corn, mixed with equal parts of bran and white middlings. After the third week the morning feed is omitted, and they have only a small quantity at supper time, until they are nine weeks old, when they are again placed in an enclosure twenty feet square for each lot of twenty. For three weeks they are given the mash three times a day, to bring them up to market condition. We clear out all young ones in July and August, when they are about twelve weeks old, for that is when they bring the highest price, namely, from twenty-three to twenty-five cents a pound in the wholesale market. It is not as profitable to keep them until fall and winter, because there is the expense of additional feed, and they don't bring more than nineteen cents a pound.

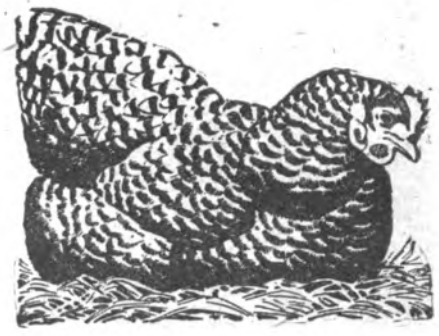
E. R.—Please read answer to E. G.

A. O.—While diarrhea is a germ disease which originates in the intestines of the hen, and is usually carried through a germ adhering to the shell, for which reason all eggs which are to be set aside should be wiped off with alcohol. A germ picked up by a newly-hatched chick, either in an incubator or under a hen, will start the trouble in a brood, because the droppings from the infected chicken spread the disease. Give chicks some milk and keep the coop or brooder very clean.

T. A. H.—Please read answer to A. O.

E. L. S.—Long-continued cases of egg-bound birds are seldom helped by any treatment. The over-fat condition has existed too long to be helped by any change in diet. Treatment: Hold the fowl with her vent in the steam arising from a dish of boiling water. If this does not sufficiently relax the parts to cause the delivery of the egg, carefully inject a tablespoonful of olive oil, and give the fowl half a teaspoonful of linseed or sweet oil every two hours. Inflammation of the egg passage may occur in connection with an egg-bound condition or may be due to the over-use of stimulating condiments and medicines. Some of the "egg foods" for sale, warranted to increase egg production, are decidedly too irritating for continued use, and are not without their dangers at any time. Inflammation of the egg passage is a serious disease. The effect of it is at once seen in the bird's movements and general appearance. There is almost a continual desire to strain, as if an egg was in the end of the duct. This straining is sometimes so violent that a blood-vessel is broken, causing death at once. "If the disease proceeds from a broken and unexpelled egg, immediate removal of the latter is indicated; for so long as this (the cause) remains, it is perfectly useless to attempt the reduction of inflammation by administering calomel, tartar emetic, or any other medicine. The finger oiled should be carefully introduced to explore the passage at its lower end, and if the broken egg is within reach it may with patience be removed with the finger. If too far away, then repeated injections of olive oil should be used, which will soothe the lining membrane of the duct, and facilitate the passage of the collapsed egg. These measures failing, then a proper pair of forceps is to be introduced, and the offending object removed without further delay. This accomplished, the passage should be syringed with a weak solution of carbolic acid, and tepid oil, and 20 to 30 grains of sulphate of magnesia administered and repeated two or three times. For some days the fowl must be kept quiet and free from stimulating food."

H. H.—Please read answer to E. L. S.



N. D.—Give your ducklings nothing for forty-eight hours, then a small quantity of mash. Mix one cupful of ground oats, the same of ground corn, and two cups of wheat bran, half-a-cup of fine, sharp sand or chick-sized grit, and a cupful of ground clover or alfalfa hay, or if you don't have the latter, cut up young clover or onion tops very fine and mix with the mash just before feeding. For the first week, mix the mash with scalding hot water, cover tightly, put in a warm place and let stand for several hours. Feed when cold, little and often. After the second week they need only be fed twice a day, and if they have free run on short grass you need not put any hay or corn in their mash. Keep them away from swimming water until they have got their feathers, but give them plenty of drinking water in a vessel deep enough for them to get their whole beak well under water. Otherwise the two small holes at the base of the bill get stuffed with mash or mud, and the ducks smother to death. Keep their sleeping place dry. They need not have a regular heated brooder, but should be shut in a small coop or well-ventilated box with plenty of bedding at night.

L. L. H.—The birds have diphtheria, which is a contagious disease so all infected birds should be removed from the rest of the flock and confined in some small house or large coop which can be easily disinfected when the trouble is all over. But unless you are keeping birds of exceptional value, I advise you to kill all that show signs of disease. But if you wish to try your skill as a doctor, dissolve half-a-teaspoonful of permanganate of potassium in half-a-pint of water. Wrap some absorbent cotton around the end of a wooden meat skewer, put a little of the permanganate lotion in a small dish and soak the wad of cotton in it, then rub the cancerous sores with it, removing as much of the false membrane as possible. Try not to make them bleed. Repeat the treatment two or three times a day. It will probably take two or three weeks to accomplish a cure, and during all that time there is danger of spreading the disease, so do take my advice and kill the sick birds. Clean and thoroughly disinfect the poultry house, feed and water dishes.

R. C. C.—The kind of brooder to get depends very much on the number of chicks you propose raising. As you plan to raise them in the fall, it will be necessary to have artificial heat, so your choice must necessarily lie between a lamp brooder, a steam-heated house, or a coal heater. If you are only going to raise a few, the lamp brooder would answer, but for anything over a hundred, I would advise the coal heater, which can be placed in any good-sized chicken house, or even a room in a dwelling house. If you will refer to COMFORT of last December and January, you will find a full description of such a brooder, the advantages obtained in using it, safety from fire and the absence of all odor, and the best method of caring for the chicks for the first twenty-four hours after they are hatched.

J. M. G.—For several seasons I have regulated the temperature and moisture in the incubators as given in the article to which you refer, and have found such regulation quite successful. When only one or two incubators are to be run during the season, they should be placed in the cellar or in a room with north windows instead of south, which is usually more apt to be uniform in temperature day and night, because the southern windows absorb much more heat from the sun during the day and lose this at night. It is also the temperature which should surround the eggs when they are turned and cooled day after day. If the room is too cool, the eggs will become too suddenly cooled and chilled, and if the room is too warm the eggs will not have a chance to become cooled sufficiently in the time allowed to remain out of the incubator. The ventilation of the room is one of the most essential features which should be looked into before the machine is started. There must be a constant supply of fresh air in the incubator room, because the eggs in developing need a constant supply of fresh air. The gases given off during incubation must be removed and supplanted by fresh air. Every incubator has some arrangement whereby fresh air is admitted to the machine at all times. Also every machine requires the airing or cooling of eggs at regular periods during the hatch. The purpose of this is to bring the eggs into contact with the fresh air. Never allow an incubator room to become stagnant or filled with stale or disagreeable odors. The system of ventilation should be so managed that no drafts of wind blow across the room and strike the machine in operation. There are several serious effects of drafts. In the first place, drafts interfere with the even burning of the lamp, causing the flame to flicker and even to smoke. This not only results in the variation of the temperature of the incubator, but fills the lamp and compartment with soot, taking away from its efficiency. There is also a serious risk of fire resulting from a flame that is kept flickering. Particular attention should be given to this point when there is a prevalence of strong winds out-of-doors. Avoid opening windows that are directly opposite in the room, particularly if the incubator is in a line between them. It is easy to get fresh air into a room without creating drafts.

The Business-Man Farmer

NO, not the business man who makes his money out of some other business and spends it on a farm—not he at all—but the real farmer who handles his farming exactly as any business man handles his business. This is the business-man farmer, and in the future no other kind will succeed or stay long on the land.

Why the Farmer Must Be a Business Man

The farmer is no longer a "settler" or a "squatter" on the land. Free government land is a thing of the past. The man who owns land from now on must buy it. To buy land he must have capital or credit or both. These two things rank him in the same class with other business men. No one can start in any kind of business without either capital or credit. If a man has capital to invest in farming he must get interest. If he uses his credit he must pay interest. In either event interest is a charge against farming that must be met. Then he has taxes, insurance, depreciation on fences, buildings, tools and machinery, stock losses and what not, all charges against his business. In all these respects his condition is identical with that of all other business men. This is the kind of business-man farmer with which this article deals—and in a few years there will be no other kind. From now on let the farmer regard himself as a business man.

What a Business Man Must Have

No business can run without a plant. The farmer's plant is his farm. But any plant must be equipped with adequate machinery if it is to pay. Let the farmer not deceive himself. He cannot run a successful plant without the necessary machinery. Then there is the raw material, which in the farmer's case is seed, fertilizers, spray materials and the like. But most important of all is the working capital. Many a plant has failed because of insufficient "working capital" or credit upon which to do business. It is a significant fact that the lack of capital has been a most frequent cause of failure in farmers' co-operative enterprises. Why? Because farmers, more than any other class, fail to appreciate the value of "working capital." Far too many farmers are under-capitalized in this respect.

Every successful business must have a plant, good machinery, sufficient raw material and necessary working capital. All these the farmer must have in the right proportions, neither too little nor too much of any of the four if his business is to succeed.

The Farm Plant

The farm plant consists of land and buildings. Often the farmer has far too much land in proportion to buildings. No one but the farmer himself can determine just what buildings are needed. Often, however, the farmer knows that he needs a house or a barn or a silo or a toolshed but doesn't have the money and is afraid of going into debt. No good business man fears debt—in fact, eighty per cent of the business of the country is conducted on credit. Why should the farmer avoid using his credit to promote his business? If he knows he needs a silo and is sure that it will make him money, why not borrow the capital just as any other business man would and build it? No business can long succeed with a poorly equipped plant—neither can the farming business.

Farm Machinery Necessary

Never was the use of farm machinery more necessary to success than now. With labor hard to get, the farmer should make liberal use of machinery. This does not mean that it is wise to buy machinery which he cannot use to advantage—a threshing machine for instance, when one can be easily hired—or a grain binder on a dairy farm, where practically no small grain is raised. But any machine that will help to get the work done on time, that can be used for several weeks in the year, that saves labor or improves the quality of work done, is necessary to successful farming, and any farmer who stocks his farm with good machinery and then fails to provide as a part of his plant a good shed for housing this machinery, is not entitled to be called a business man. Necessary machines can and should if necessary, be bought on credit.

Keep a Stock of Raw Materials

No business can long operate without raw materials. Too many farmers just work from "hand to mouth" on raw materials. The business farmer lays in a supply of seed and feed and fertilizers and twine when they can be bought to advantage. Few farmers raise all the feed they use, or could use to advantage.

If the farm is producing all the feed it can, that is no good reason why more feed may not be fed with profit. It must always be remembered that purchased feed enriches the soil while sold feed robs it of its fertility. The farmer who buys feed and then uses a manure spreader to distribute this fertility over the land is building up the soil of his farm. But the time to buy feed is when the price is "right." Suppose the farmer doesn't happen to have the money just then. Let him borrow it; any good business man would do the same thing in order to lay in a supply of raw material at advantageous prices.

Why Working Capital?

All kinds of business need working capital. With a good supply of raw material on hand, good tools and machinery and a satisfactory plant, there is still a chance to use capital to advantage. Perhaps more pigs are needed to use up an extra good crop of corn; or a pure-bred bull to improve the herd; or an extra horse on the gang plow. These may be had when needed if working capital is employed either in cash or credit. The farmer who buys and sells takes a speculative chance, it is true, but he soon learns how to make good investments. It is an old saying that "It takes money to make money." Like many "old saws," this is not exactly true. It could better be said that it takes judgment to make money, and that judgment will dictate whether to use credit or not if money is not available. The farmer, more than any other class of business men, needs to learn the use of "credit." He is too much afraid of debt—a sort of traditional fear of long standing among farmers. It takes courage and credit to make money on the farm as well as anywhere else.

Mr. Farmer and Company

Wise is the farmer who has taken his whole family into business with him.

A wife, sons and daughters will prove mighty valuable assets when they are vitally interested in the work of the farm, and when they are responsible for their particular part of it.

Take the wife into the company. No man can expect his wife to put her whole heart into his work unless he allows her to have a voice in the planning of the work—the investments that are made—and a "say-so" as how the income from the farm is to be spent.

Many a wife has as good judgment and is as keen as to profitable farm management as her husband. Two, planning together—discussing problems in which they are both so interested, cannot help but be of great assistance to each other. 'Tis a foolish farmer who makes up his mind that he can "go it alone"—decide everything himself and buy this or that without even mentioning it to his wife or family.

Of course, there are some men who think the wife will help any way—well, she will from a sense of duty—but how much better to make her a real partner—one who has equally as much say about the farm's business as he himself. And why shouldn't she be a real business partner? She works as hard, puts in as many hours as her husband and is just as responsible for the farm's prosperity as he is.

If the wife knows she is an active member of the firm, husband need not think he can keep better informed on any farm question than she. She will be just as keen a reader of farm papers, agricultural bulletins, and just as anxious to be right up to date in modern farm methods.

Let no farmer think a woman cannot farm. Why, I have a personal acquaintance with and know of many women who are leaders as farmers in their respective states.

Some of these women are widows whose husbands made dismal failures, and these women, when they have taken over the business of the farm, have succeeded not only well but rank right beside the very best of farmers.

One particular woman I have in mind is so very successful and is at the head of such an up-todate prosperous plant, that she was retained by one of the leading agricultural colleges of the country as one of its extension lecturers.

And so on I could keep citing instance after instance where women have won out where men have failed, so there is no need to fear that the wife cannot be trusted to be taken into active partnership and be one of the leaders of the firm.

GIVE THE BOYS A CHANCE.—Happy is the farmer who can paint on his farm buildings the name of the farm, and under it: "Mr. Farmer and Sons," breeders of pure-bred cattle or hogs or whatever line of farming he may be specializing in.

He can be mighty proud of the "Son" part for back of that one simple word is a mighty good story that he who rides by can easily read into it.

Here is a man who has dealt fair by his boys, has been wise enough to interest them, and has made their farm experience so pleasant that they are glad to stay on the farm and go into business with their father.

Such a father is not one who gives a puny calf or a runt of a pig to the son and when the boy has worked hard and saved its life, cared for and fed it, raised it to good market size, the father calmly pockets the money and thinks it a little harmless joke about "Johnny owning the pig." Too many farmers like this! Oh, yes, they expect Johnny to work, run errands, do chores and be generally useful, and all for his board and clothes and because he is his boy and "don't earn his salt, any way."

Suppose he doesn't "do enough to pay for his 'salt',"—he never will for the father who tells him so or makes him believe he is no good. A wise father makes his son think the farm couldn't get along without him and he is his father's "right-hand man." A boy who is made to think he is really helping will soon be helping, and when a boy knows he is of some importance on the farm, and a part of it, the father need not worry about his leaving as soon as he grows up and can get the chance.

Boys love animals—a pig or lamb or a calf for his very own—to sell and have the money when it has grown, is a great experience for a boy. If he is old enough, and it is possible, he will take great interest in a special crop which he alone is responsible for. If he has a personal interest in the farm, he may grow to like it, and then father will be sure of his help when he is old enough to be of real assistance.

THE GIRLS, TOO, SHOULD BELONG TO THE FIRM.—Not long ago I was talking with a sixteen-year-old farm boy. He is a boy who has worked a lot from quite a little fellow and he was telling how "now we (please notice the 'we') have all our debts paid up but $350.00, and it won't take long for father and me to clean that up." This boy is not going to leave the farm; not he; he is busily planning on how he will take the short course at the Agricultural College the coming winter. And why? Because he has always been made to feel that his father and mother could not get along without him. When he was a wee fellow, he would sturdily carry in, stick by stick, the wood for the range, because "mother could not bake unless 'sonny' helped her." And so with the girls. What holds true for the boy on the farm is equally true for the girl, and though father and mother cannot hope always to keep the daughter, yet they may have the great satisfaction of sending a capable, worth-while woman out to grace another home;—a woman who can look back on her girlhood and know, as far as possible, she was given an equal chance with her brother.

So the wise farmer is the farmer whose business is done by a firm of which Wife, Son and Daughter are all leading members.

Need of Pure Bred Sires

What are the readers of COMFORT doing in the improvement of their farm animals? All over the country, since war conditions are lessening as a major subject of thought, worry and expense, attention is again being directed to the improvement of horses, cattle, sheep, swine and poultry. Men are forming clubs and associations in many states. Children are being encouraged to form calf and pig and lamb clubs, and the young animals grow into adult beasts for marketing and the young people develop into the "grown-ups" who are to run our farms. We have been taught to train up children in the way they should go and that in later life they will not depart from their early training. All these things are good, and we want to know that our readers are taking full part in the good work.

In a big county of Wisconsin, cattle breeders actually are offering to exchange a pure-bred young bull for the scrub bull of any neighbor. The scrub is sold for what he will bring and so eliminated from further damage to the breeding industry of the district and state. The breeder of the pure-bred makes his profit in the better success of his neighbor, his neighborhood, the community and the state. He also reaps an incidental profit, in that the neighbor who is given the chance to demonstrate for himself the advantage of a pure-bred sire in improving his dairy or beef cattle, is in the market ever after, as need occurs, for the purchase of other and perhaps better pure-bred bulls. So it is with the use of pure-bred sires in the raising of horses, sheep and swine. Once started, the sensible man never goes back to the use of a grade or scrub sire. He finds that the profits from his better graded-up stock far exceed those formerly obtained from his scrubs, which ate as much or more and never paid for their board.

It is absolutely necessary now to use only pure-bred sires of good individuality and known to be from sires and dams of profitable producing strains. There is no advantage whatever in merely using a sire that is pedigreed, but not of producing stock. Pure blood and profitability in performance in the dairy or on the block must go together if success is to be assured.

The scrub sire can only beget worthless scrubs and such animals are not worth feeding. They do not return worth-while profits for the care and feed they receive. The owner of a scrub sire also finds himself nowadays in a class that wise people are looking at askance, and rightly so. To be "in the swim" and given credit for brains and good sense, they should abandon the old, haphazzard and wasteful methods of breeding and feeding and at once join in the work of improvement.

The grade sire was sired by a pure-bred, but, unlike his sire, he is unable to grade-up his progeny. He cannot transmit with certainty the good qualities of his sire. One cannot be sure what he will do as a breeder and cannot afford to run the chance that he will only transmit the characteristics of the scrub side of his pedigree, which is much the stronger factor in his makeup.

The scrub-pure-bred sire is pedigreed and may look fairly well, but, there being no actual merit for performance in his dam or sires, he lacks ability to transmit good, profitable qualities to his offspring. He is a counterfeit and should be avoided, as is the scrub and grade sire.

The bred-for-performance, pure, pedigreed sire is the only sure means of improvement. Used year after year in a dairy herd, and always seeking to use a better and better sire of the same breed and kind, the cows will gradually but surely improve in milk production and butter fat production, as well as symmetry and uniformity in color and the breed characteristics of the breed of the sires used. The same is true as regards beef-bred cattle, and swine and sheep produced, as gradually improving grades, from consecutive, consistent use of pure-bred sires.

COMFORT readers, why wait another year before starting on the road to success and profit by the use of pure-bred sires? Make the step in the right direction now and yours will be the profit soon, and profit and pleasure in farming will be assured to those who are to come after and keep on the good work of feeding the nation at home and having to spare much for the feeding of folk abroad. We shall be delighted to give advice on any phase of this subject, so do not hesitate to ask questions.

The Kicking Heifer

The rough or oftentimes impatient or bad-tempered milker often wonders why he has so much trouble from the heifers kicking at milking time. His "trouble" is not to be wondered at. He should understand that the teats of the heifer that has just had her first calf are exquisitely tender, so that she cannot bear harsh handling. The pain from rough milking is excruciating. Often the heifer shakes, shrinks, and even urinates from fear as the milker is about to commence operations, and kicking is the next indication of the suffering endured. Were it possible, the heifer should be "broken in" to milk by a woman, whose hands are softer than those of the hard-working man, and who naturally is more gentle, sympathetic and sensible than the average hired hand or stockman. Before starting to milk, the udder should be gently massaged, and it is also well to apply vaseline or sweet oil to the hands. More can be accomplished by kindness and gentleness than by roughness or punishment. In some cases the heifer will stand more quiet at milking time if allowed to eat some relished food, or if her calf is put near her. If kicking starts, it may be prevented in some instances by tying a rope or strap around the body, just in front of the udder, but the rope should be well padded to protect the milk veins. If this does not suffice, a wide strap may be buckled around the hind legs just above the hocks, or hobbles may be placed upon the hind pasterns and straps run from them to a bellyband, or collar placed upon the neck. Prevention is better than cure, however, and it comes from gentle handling of the teats when the heifer is being broken in to milk.

Those of our readers who live in the "sage brush country," where poisonous weeds often kill range cattle and sheep, and where loco weed also seriously affects horses as well as other animals, will be interested to learn that experimentation by scientists of the Department of Agriculture has proved that the larkspurs do not poison sheep, although they are very poisonous to cattle. This will be news to many, for it has been the common impression that sheep as well as cattle were poisoned by this beautiful flowering weed. It also has been proved that it does not injure horses upon the open range, but poisons them if taken in large quantities.

Practically all of the readers of COMFORT are well acquainted with the larkspurs of the gardens, and so will readily recognize the wild plants. The latter, however, are blue and violet blue in color, and in one instance white. There are no pink wild larkspurs like those of the garden. Aconite, also a deadly poison, has deep blue flowers somewhat like those of the larkspur and running into shades of violet and purple. Aconite has short, bulblike roots, while those of the tall larkspur are long and woody. Aconite stems are pithy and the leaves have very short stems; tall larkspur has hollow stems and the leaves have long stems.

Larkspur is deadly early in the season before blossoming, if the animal eats 30 pounds or more of the weed. It is not poisonous after the flowers have matured, unless the animal happens to eat large quantities of the seeds, which rarely happens. The weed may be eradicated by spading, in which operation six to eight inches of the root should be removed and the cattle prevented from eating the dried plant.

Cattle poisoned by larkspur suddenly drop to the ground and kick convulsively. The symptoms aggravate if the animal is hurried to its feet. Constipation usually is present; some animals bloat; food often gets into the windpipe and lungs and causes death. Bloating takes place almost immediately after death in all cases.

In the way of treatment, bloated cattle should be "tapped" at once. Permanganate of potash solution, much advertised as a remedy, has been found useless. The Department veterinarians advise that weak animals should be given a hypodermic injection of six drams of whiskey, and in all cases good results followed the subcutaneous injection of a mixture of physostigmin salicylate, 1 grain; pilocarpin hydrochlorid, 2 grains, and strychnine sulphate, ½ grain. This is one dose for an animal of 500 to 600 pounds. Double the dose is given to a 1000 pound or over cow or steer. The medicine is dissolved in 4 drams (½ ounce) of freshly boiled water, or 1 ounce for the double dose. An all-metal hypodermic syringe should be used, the needle to be inserted in the shoulder.

Through the columns of this department subscribers may have free advice from the eminent specialists and experts of our Agricultural Staff on questions relating to farming, live stock and dairying.

Questions and Answers

SWEET BASIL.—I notice that in a recent issue you advise to plant sweet basil (or bazil) in the herb garden. I had some once and liked its flavor very much. The last seed I had was old and did not come up, and since then I have never been able to get any. Will you kindly tell me where I can obtain the seed?
MRS. G. D. B., Clarksville, Ark.

A.—Consult seed catalogues and write seedsmen if you do not find this seed advertised in their catalogues. It is usually spelled "basil."

CURING TOBACCO.—Have grown some tobacco this year and would like to know how to cure the leaves for smoking. H. G. B., Greenfield Ctr., N. Y.

A.—It is pretty hard for the grower to cure "killdad" so as to make it fit for smoking. Better sell your leaves and buy "store" tobacco.

SOFT BUTTER.—My cow does not make firm, solid butter. She seems to be in healthy condition. She just runs on pasture and has no dry feed. The cream is separated and kept in the well. What is thee cause of the butter being soft? MRS. H. K., Noble, Ill.

A.—This is not the cow's fault. You probably do not keep your butter or cream cool enough. Churning too warm cream or over-churning or keeping butter at too high a temperature is the usual cause of soft or "salvy" butter.

Little Wonder Oil Stoves

Do as much with one gallon of oil as any other oil stove will with ten. Instead of 80% of the heat going to waste around the sides of the kettles, all of it is utilized in our fuel-saver top.

The ideal stove for Country Homes, Cottages, Touring, Camping, Yachting, etc. Pays for itself in one year by saving oil. One gallon burns 16 to 20 hours. Why bother with wood or coal or the old-fashioned oil stove that takes forever to get a meal? It boils a quart of water in three minutes and makes country cooking as easy as with city gas.

Guaranteed as represented or money refunded.

The stoves will be handled through dealers everywhere. But if you want one this summer, send money order or check direct to factory and stove will be shipped at once with directions and guarantee

Automobile and Gas Engine Helps

Questions relating to gasolene engines and automobiles, by our subscribers, addressed to COMFORT Auto Dept., Augusta, Maine, will be answered by our expert, free, in the columns of this department. Full name and address is required, but initials only will be printed. That we may intelligently diagnose your trouble please state the year in which your car was made.

Fire

AN insurance policy will protect a person against financial loss from fire but anyone who will not take steps to prevent damage does not practice the dictates of prudence. Due to the supply of gasolene carried by cars using the internal combustion motor, there is danger of fire exploding the fuel and causing considerable damage. However, not every so-called "automobile fire" is caused from ignited gasolene, and there is no reason for shoveling into a car a few tons of sand or emptying several fire extinguishers when all that is needed is the exercising of plain common sense.

The writer can recall an owner who had purchased his first car and after running it for a time was advised to pour kerosene in the cylinders and allow it to stand over night so as to loosen the carbon. Upon starting the motor, clouds of thick smoke were emitted from the muffler. The owner was certain that his car had caught fire and there is no stating what damage he might have done had not his next-door neighbor hurriedly explained that the smoke was due to the kerosene in the cylinders and that when it was burned out, the motor would run without smoking.

Gasolene will burn freely when exposed to air. The vulcanizer shown in the accompanying illustration affords an example of the point to be driven home, viz., gasolene will not explode but will burn freely when exposed to the air.

This instance may bring a smile to the face of the reader, but more foolish stunts are being pulled off every day by owners and drivers who have had years of experience.

A particular owner smelled smoke, and upon raising the hood found that the smoke was coming from the generator. He immediately threw a quantity of water on the instrument, when the proper proceedure would have been to disconnect one of the wires leading from the rear of the generator. By so doing, he would have broken the electrical circuit and allowed the instrument to cool off.

A point to bear in mind is that the overheating of an electrical instrument is due to an irregularity in the system, and the proper thing to do until the trouble is located and corrected is to break or open the electrical circuit at that point.

If a cable is overheated and melting the insulation, the circuit can readily be opened by disconnecting either cable leading to the storage battery.

A gasolene fire is more often the result of a back fire through the carburetor than from any other cause. Almost every owner understands this condition. It is the result of fire in the cylinder when the inlet valve is opened and causing the vapor in the inlet manifold to be ignited.

First, let it be emphatically stated that water is the poorest agent you can select to fight a gasolene fire. Gasolene is lighter than water and it will therefore float on the surface and increase the area of the fire. To handle a fire caused by a pop-back through the carburetor, the best bet is to sit in the car, open the throttle wide and turn the motor over with the electric starter. It may be possible to extinguish the fire by drawing the flames through the motor. However, if the fire continues and there is no one handy to lend a hand, raise the hood and shut off the vacuum tank. This will cut off the supply of fuel and the fire will die out when it has consumed the gasolene in the carburetor. But if it is impossible to control the flames and they shoot up around the vacuum tank, bear in mind that the heat will generate gas which cannot escape, and if the heat becomes great enough, there will be an explosion inside the tank. This will open up the seams of the tank and it will be well to put a little distance between yourself and the car when the explosion takes place. On the other hand, if you can keep the flames away from the tank and the gasolene supply is shut off, there is little if any danger.

Gasolene will not explode but its vapor will. Gasolene will burn with but little smoke and spreads readily. A chemical extinguisher is best for fighting a gasolene fire.

An oil fire is not difficult to fight. It is slow burning and spreading. Bear in mind that as long as the fire keeps away from the tanks containing gasolene there is little danger in fighting it. However, when the flames commence to envelop the tanks, if the flames cannot be subdued quickly, the chances are that an explosion will occur, and you do not want to be in the near vicinity.

Useful Pointers

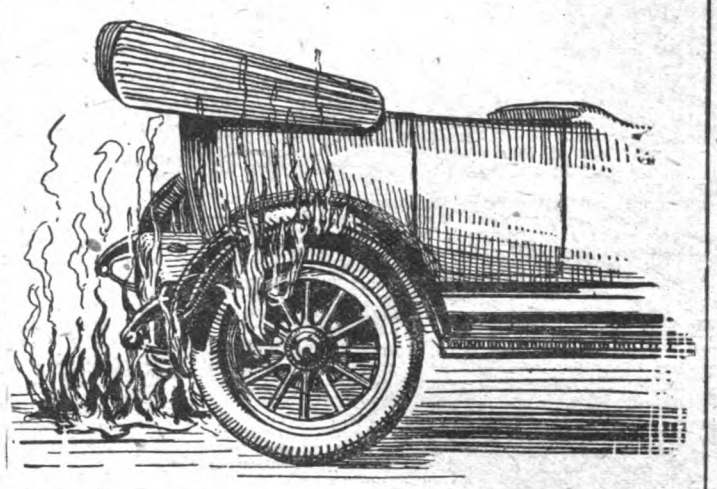
Battery Tests

When the ignition current fails, the lights refuse to burn and in fact all the electrical appliances seem dead, the indications are that the storage battery has suddenly gone wrong. If the cables leading into the battery are tight, a simple test is to bridge the battery terminals with the pliers. Dig the handles of the pliers into the lead terminals and if there is no flashing of sparks, you are safe in assuming that a dead battery is the cause for your trouble. A defective plate will instantly kill a battery.

Testing the Gas Mixture

A simple test which will aid the new owner in determining whether he is using a correct gasolene-air mixture is to drive the car in the back yard on a dark night and open the muffler cut-out. Open the throttle until the motor turns over at a fair rate of speed and then notice the color of the flame that will be shooting from the cut-out. If the flame is blue or colorless, the mixture is about right. If the flame is yellow, there is too much air while a red flame would indicate that there is too much gasolene in the mixture.

Wiring Hint



Some folks are unable to do a good wiring job because they fail to apply the wire to terminals in the correct manner. The bare wire should be twisted around the terminal post in a clockwise direction. It requires but little logic to understand that the screw-thread is right handed and when tightened down on the wire will have a tendency to draw it tighter around the terminal post. On the other hand, if the wire is attached in the other direction the tendency is to untwist it and force it away from the post.

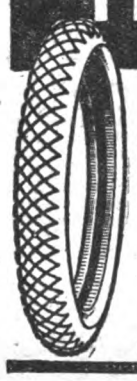
Substitute for Match

Should you turn your pockets inside out and fail to find a match to light your pipe or cigar, open one of the priming cocks in the head of the cylinder, race the motor and a flame will shoot up so that you will be able to get a light.

Electrical Shocks

Until the electrical current produced by the storage battery is stepped up to a higher potential, it will produce no shock should the operator bridge the terminals. It is voltage (pressure) which causes the muscles to contract. The average battery used for automobile purposes is of low voltage and high amperage. It will range from six to eight volts and approximately 100 amperes.

This illustration shows the flames enveloping the gasolene tank. The gasolene in the tank is not exposed to the air and, therefore, when sufficient heat has been generated, there will be an explosion. If a fire such as shown cannot be extinguished quickly, it is not safe for the operator to continue fighting it.



Substitute for Rivet

Should a rivet break out, never allow that portion of the car to remain in a weakened condition because you do not have the facilities for replacing the rivet. A bolt, the same size as the rivet, will afford a very satisfactory substitute.

Answer to Inquiry

Although the writer is not posted on the make of electrical apparatus mentioned in your letter, yet it is safe to assume, from the description given, that your difficulty is due to excessive vibration. It may be just possible that the cutout is so mounted that it is affected by vibration in such a manner as to keep the contact points apart. It will be well to shift the location of the units, especially the cutout as it will possibly overcome the resulting evils of the vibration. On the other hand, if the generator commutator is not perfectly smooth, it would be possible to throw the brush out of contact.

WILL some of the Home Canning Club girls do a little favor for me? Thanks ever so much. This is what I'd like to have you do—can some of these lovely summer days and send them to me (collect) so we can have them to open up next January and Febuary when we are up to our necks in snowdrifts and shivering around in fur coats. Isn't that a clever idea? Of course if you can't do it we'll have to make the most of every day as it comes but we should do that anyway, regardless of the season. But I'm not making the most of my time, am I? sermonizing thus when I should be reading the heap of letters before me. I'll shut my eyes and draw one.

MICKIE OF MISSISSIPPI.—If I had curly hair and dreamy eyes with long eyelashes, good teeth and dimples, do you think I'd be unhappy because I had a large mouth? I should say not—I'd smile so much that my teeth and dimples would attract every bit of attention away from my large mouth. Besides, large mouths indicate more character than tiny mouths. It isn't so much how your mouth looks as the things you say with it that counts. I've seen perfectly beautiful mouths that looked ugly to me just because they were saying disagreeable, sarcastic things that hurt someone else. And speaking of such things, here's a tip for you and other girls who want men to admire them. A man doesn't admire a catty woman so be careful what you say about other people, particularly other girls, if you want to make a hit with the boys and have them think you a regular girl. No matter what you know about another girl, from her complexion to her morals, keep still, unless you can say something good, and if you can't say something good don't say anything at all. Of course it is better to do this from purely altruistic reasons, but better a selfish reason than to say little, mean, spiteful things.

IN DOUBT, Colorado.—It would take more of a psychologist than I am to tell why you can't talk of and plan for the future with your fiance whom you say you are lonely without and know he is what makes life worth while. Are you sure you don't mind giving up the comforts you have been accustomed to at home? My dear, love and a comfortable little home is a combination that is worth more than luxuries without love—but you might try giving him up for a little while until you are sure of yourself. Talk it over with him and explain how you feel and ask him to be patient with you until you know better how you feel toward him. But don't be too long finding out for there are plenty of girls ready to discuss the future with a worthwhile man.

M. and D., Sayre.—When girls of seventeen—high school girls at that— spell whom "whome" and their "thier," it is a waste of time to tell me they are interested in their school books. In my days, when I was young, a boy felt honored if a nice girl would consent to marry him; he never made it a condition that he be allowed to kiss her and then as a reward condescend to marry her. As I have said before, how times have changed! And then to think you'd ask if you should allow them to kiss you if you should keep company with them again. Haven't you any pride? Why not place a little higher valuation upon yourself? Anyway, don't get married now.

BROWN EYES, Salt Lick, Ky.—It isn't wise to exchange photographs with anyone but close relatives—and I know a lot of relatives that are dreadfully close. A girl of fifteen shouldn't keep company with a man of twenty-five, or any other age. Do I think that men of that age mean what they say to girls? I certainly do—just as much at twenty-five as they do at any age. Why don't I put my picture in the paper? Well, of course I don't like to praise myself but if I did all the girls would be jealous—I'm so very, very beautiful, but don't tell them I told you so.

ELOIS, Texas.—It doesn't seem to be a case of "should you give him up" when he has given you up for another girl. You haven't much choice left in the matter and, anyway, he is much too old for you.

WOULD-BE NURSE, Missouri.—Your family physician can give you more information regarding hospitals and your fitness for training than I can. Have a talk with him.

S. B., Texas.—It is sad to be an "orphant stinarapher" in love with a man whose people threaten to "disinheart" him if he marries you. It's sad, very sad, that's just what it is but when I think of a big "bizniss collage" letting loose such spelling as that, I am moved to tears, actual tears, and my laundry hasn't been returned from the laundry—anybody lend me a hanky? Thanks! You've got the right idea when you say that nature teaches you not to believe him when he says he will "dye" for you, though I presume you mean "die." "Men have died and worms have eaten them, but not for love." I've forgotten who wrote those gruesome lines but you've got to admit that he knew what he was talking about. If he means "dye," do you suppose he'd mind doing some faded out waists and dresses for me?

OUT O' LUCK, Oregon.—Why "long for a sister" when there are hundreds and hundreds of orphan "sisters" in the world, in various homes and institutions, who are longing for a brother and a home? Have your parents adopt one if they are able to give her a good home, education and love. In the meantime you may regard me as a big sister, if you wish to, and I'll hold the place for a little sister. Thanks for all the nice things you said about me.

J. B., Oregon.—An older sister has a moral right to object to the marriage of her younger sister who will "soon be sixteen," but when the younger sister is old enough to be married she shouldn't object unless she could give good reasons for her objections. (2) The age of your friend has a lot to do with the way her question would be answered. "Children, obey your parents," is a safe rule to follow. If there is no truth in the accusations against her fiance, he should be able to square himself with her parents and if there is they are right in telling him to "clear out."

A SOLDIER'S WIFE, North Carolina.—There should be an exchange in any of the large cities in your state where you could dispose of your fancy work. Try an advertisement in your local paper.

OLIVE, Ind.—Of course you did right in giving back his ring and instead of feeling heartbroken you should congratulate yourself on your lucky escape. If you had been married to him you would have cause to feel heartbroken.

JESSIE, Minneapolis, Minn.—Instead of striking the person who annoyed you while at the movies, it would have been less conspicuous to have changed your seat or quietly notified the usher who would have put him out. Athletics, if done in the right way and not carried to excess, are beneficial instead of injurious, as your mother says, and they aren't commonly regarded as unladylike.

WINIFRED S. Dak.—If you love a young man and know that he loves you and still he won't marry you because he has such an "artistic temperament and love of the beautiful" that his wife must be beautiful, then you should be thankful that you aren't beautiful according to his standard. If he is capable of appreciating only outward perfections instead of beauty of mind and soul, then your love would be wasted upon him. Save it for the man who loves you for yourself and who will find you beautiful even though the years and responsibilities of a home and family haven't added to your good looks. As the mother of his children, you should be the most beautiful person in the world to him.

Have a good time for the rest of the summer for next month we must go back to school or work.

By, by, COUSIN MARION.

The Beast of Blossom Valley

By Alice L. Whitson

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub,, Inc.

"THIS is a hell of a life for a fellow in my circumstances to be living," John Brunnett exclaimed as he tramped restlessly up and down the untidy living-room of his elegant country home. "No wonder folks call me a beast!" he continued, as though he had a sympathetic audience, "to be living in all this filth, when I've got more money than I know what to do with, and still," he went on in a softer tone of voice as he sank into a comfortable, dust-laden chair in front of a cheery crackling fire, "my money isn't strong enough to keep a servant in the house."

A nauseating sensation seemed to envelope his very soul as he glanced around the big, old-fashioned room—the same room which during his mother's lifetime had been his haven of rest, as well as the lounging-place for a host of his friends who invariably dropped in for a quiet Sunday with him. These were good old days to John Brunnett—in fact, life had been one long drawn-out bit of happiness and contentment for the owner of Blossom Valley until the death of his mother two years previously.

Then it was that John began to understand what it really meant to have a woman in the house—especially a woman who loved him and who loved to do things for his comfort without being paid for it. But since the death of his mother he had been living by the "pay-as-you-enter" system, and in no single instance had he paid the same servant for two months' service hand-running.

Sometimes he admitted to himself that they had grounds for complaint when they argued that the place was lonely; he had found it that way himself lately, especially since his friends had ceased to drop in for Sundays any more. Of course, there was a reason for that. The whole place resembled an over-grown graveyard, and living in such an atmosphere had not sweetened his disposition—he had grown into a grouch; he had long since learned it was unwise to invite his friends to eat any more, for on several occasions he had been forced to feed them on his own cooking—and now he was cookless again. How, oh, how, he wondered, had his mother kept the same servants year after year? He wished with all his heart that he had paid more attention to inside affairs; running the big farm was a small item, in John's eyes, compared to running a house.

If an extra man was needed in case of emergency, he could fall in line and do it himself; nothing gave him more joy than the touch of freshly ploughed ground beneath his feet. He had always loved the great outdoors, and since the death of his mother he had spent much time in the open. "But what man can make a success of farming and housekeeping both?" he raved, remembering suddenly that the inner man was clamoring for food.

Just at this instant Judy, the buxom wife of Andy, the general roustabout on the place, made her appearance in the doorway, bearing in her hands a covered tray.

"I 'lowed your might be hungry-like," Marse John," Judy said in true southern style, "and I brung you a bite fer to eat."

The hungry man graciously accepted the food, and as Judy's flaky biscuits disappeared, it suddenly occurred to him that Judy herself might be an avenue of escape.

"Judy," he said presently, "I don't see why you couldn't move into the servants' quarters in the back yard, and look after my house and cooking?"

Judy ran her fingers through the kinky black mop on her head.

"'Scuse me, Marse John, for de 'spression," she answered soberly, "but men folks ain't fittin' fer to boss a house. Now, ef—ef—you'd jes' mar'y, Marse John, I spec' your old woman and me could set dis place in order in no time. It jes' naturally takes a woman fer to make a home."

"Thanks for the advice, Judy," the man returned, "but I don't happen to be one of the marrying kind. Could you suggest anything else?"

"Yes, sir," Judy responded instantly. "You might hire a housekeeper—a nice white lady, who'd 'preciate living in a big house like dis here'n."

"But how'd I ever locate one like that, Judy?"

"Advertise fer her, Marse John, advertise—dats what I does when I wants anytings. Didn't you find me and Andy through de papers?"

"I certainly did," John admitted, "and I'll think about your suggestion, Judy," he declared solemnly as he swallowed the last bite of the appetizing meal that black Judy from the generosity of her white soul had brought in.

After Judy's departure John Brunnett filled his pipe and took down a good book—a good pipe and a good book usually set John in a good humor—but even his old favorites failed to soothe him at present. Judy's suggestion of hiring a housekeeper kept coming into his mind. Maybe Judy was right—a man didn't know how to run a house successfully—it wasn't intended that he should, but it wasn't unlawful for him to own a home and hire somebody to run it; he had the home and the money to pay for having it run, and suddenly he resolved to try out Judy's scheme—he'd find a woman for the place.

Instantly he reached for the newspaper, and turned to the advertising columns. Cooks—cooks and housekeepers seemed to be greatly in demand, but the numerous advertisements were from people like himself, not from people offering their services.

Carefully he studied the various advertisements, and before he went to bed that night he had turned in an ad. of his own over long distance, that he felt sure would at least be read, and, oh, how he hoped, be answered. If he could only get a chance to hire a woman on his terms he could rest assured of one thing—he'd have a servant for twelve months at least—and as he drifted off to sleep, the thought of the untidy condition of the whole house haunted him; he wondered drowsily if it wouldn't take about that long to get it in a livable shape again, provided he could get anybody to undertake the job.

* * * * * * *

The clock in Leeds' big brokerage office loudly clamored the hour of ten A. M. as Tiny Thaxton laid aside her rain-soaked coat and made her way toward a desk near the window.

"Glad to see you, Miss Thaxton," the Boss said more pleasantly than a boss generally speaks.

But Tiny fully understood the reason for his gladness came from the mere fact that she of all the office girls was the only one who had braved the wintry weather to reach her desk; but business was business with Tiny—she believed in giving good service when she sold her time—and her time she considered both valuable to herself and her employer, but try as she would, with the ever increasing prices it was almost impossible to make her salary reach from week to week. This fact alone had caused her to think seriously of changing her position. Therefore, from force of habit, while the male inhabitants of the office were at lunch, she picked up the morning paper to glance over the "Help Wanted" columns; she had known of a few cases where a stenographer had profited by reading the "Want" advertisements—some very reputable firms had resorted to the ad. columns for efficient help.

Scarcely, however, had she opened the paper at the desired page until she found herself staring at a double-spaced, black-lettered ad:

"WANTED—A competent housekeeper for a country home—salary no object to right party, who will sign contract for twelve months' service. Apply ready for work at Blossom Valley Lodge, Franklin road."

"There's your chance for a change, Tiny Thaxton," Conscience whispered. "Go out and investigate the proposition."

Tiny noticed with a sickening sensation around her heart that the paper in her hand shook perceptibly with nervousness. Her doctor had advised her to get out of the office more than once of late, but there seemed so few things left for a woman to do who was trained for office work—and she had been an office fixture for how long? Ever since Leed Brothers had opened the brokerage office she had been with them—something like fifteen years! Yes, she reminded herself, it had been exactly fifteen years; she had come to Leeds on her twentieth birthday, and now she was thirty-five—she was sure she looked every day of it, too, though at times her eyes still twinkled with mirth and her hair had lost none of its gold—what she needed was exercise and fresh air—the doctor had told her so. "Surely," she murmured under her breath, "I'd find both at Blossom Valley—the name itself suggests fresh air and flowers.

"But your friends," Conscience reminded her, "what would they think of you occupying the place of a servant in the house?"

Suddenly it dawned upon her that her friends were very few—and her people—she had no people—she was the last Thaxton of a long line that reached back to the beginning of America—there was nothing to lose, but a great chance for self-gain, and so far as holding down the job was concerned, it never occurred to her that she'd fail in that. Fact was, she knew she wouldn't—she was a born home-maker; she loved everything pertaining to a house, from a dust-rag to a lounging-chair.

Timidly the girl glanced towards the clock; it lacked ten minutes to one. At one she would be free to spend the afternoon as she pleased. Saturday afternoon was always a holiday from the office, though in her case it was usually wash day. She remembered the soiled clothes waiting for her in the little room on Mrs. Wilkins' third floor front; she was wearing her last fresh blouse—cleanliness was one of Tiny's strong points—perhaps she'd better go back and perform her usual Saturday afternoon duty; she loved to be fresh for the office, and, after all—it wasn't such a bad place to live, though it was a grind—a continual grind that was beginning to tell on her—and again, she noticed with horror how the paper shook in her trembling hands.

At one-fifteen she was on the street again, the idea of applying for the position as housekeeper fresh in her mind. She was glad the rain had ceased, but the wind that had taken its place was quite as uncomfortable.

At the first corner she learned the current was off—nothing new about that—currentless days had become a sort of fad—and walking home had become a habit; she often wished, and never as much as now, that she could live nearer her work. That, however, was an impossibility on her present salary.

At the next crossing she found traffic blocked with standing cars. From idle curiosity she began looking at the various streets they represented, and a queer little feeling crept into her heart when she realized that heading them all was a great lumbersome-looking car marked in plain, bold letters, Franklin Interurban, immediately suggesting to her that were she of the mind to go, this particular car would take her to Blossom Valley.

"I'm going to do it," Tiny declared to herself suddenly.

Tiny Thaxton was given to hasty decisions, and a moment later she was climbing on. Had the car not started almost instantly, it is a safe bet that she would have hopped off—but the car did start, and thus it happened that presently she found herself looking out of the window on wide, misty meadows seared and brown with last year's grasses. The naked trees that bordered either side of the way seemed to nod a friendly greeting to her as she passed along.

"The trip might prove less than nothing," she mused as she gave herself up to the beauty of nature, so far as a change of position was concerned, but already she felt better for a sight of the country—and in her heart she knew she'd be refreshed for the office by the pilgrimage.

Finally the conductor called out "Blossom Valley Lodge." The car came to a stop and Tiny got off.

"You don't happen to know where Blossom Valley Lodge is, do you?" she inquired of a man in an oil-cloth slicker and high, clumsy boots, whom she found in the little makeshift station.

"First house to the right," he replied gruffly. "Any relation to the owner?"

"No, but I have a reason for calling."

"You can't miss the way, but you may find the road sloppy."

Tiny waited for no further conversation, but immediately started down the broad, winding road, made sweet by the morning rain. Rounding a turn, suddenly she caught sight of a wonderful looking old house nestling far back from the road among a cluster of friendly oaks.

"Surely this heavenly paradise can't be the place I'm looking for!" she said as she stopped at the big gate.

But only for a moment did she feel uncertain about the matter, for lifting her eyes to the massive rock archway over her head, she saw plainly carved in the great stones half hidden in a mass of dead, tangled rose-vines, the words: "Blossom Valley Lodge."

Without a moment's hesitation she lifted the iron latch from its socket and passed inside. In a state of wonderment and joy she made her way briskly up the long, pebbly drive and timidly raised the old-fashioned brass knocker. She noticed while she waited that the knocker was sorely in need of polish, and her fingers instantly yearned for a wool rag.

Presently the door swung open, and a man—a big, broad-shouldered man, clad in khaki trousers and a brown wool shirt, stood before her. One glance, convinced her he was a man of affairs and wholly in harmony with the place.

"I—I—came in answer to your advertisement," she stammered softly.

Instantly the man's hand was clutching her shoulder, and she felt herself bodily drawn into the room.

"Come up to the fire," John Brunnett said gruffly, eying her all the while suspiciously. "We'll talk things over."

As he helped her out of her coat he noticed how tiny and frail she looked, and a mad desire to cuddle her up in his arms took possession of him—he was startled at his own foolishness—he almost wished he had taken Judy's advice and advertised for a wife instead of a housekeeper. Finally remembering himself, he drew forth a chair and bade her be seated.

"Has anybody else applied for the position you have open, Mr.—er——"

"Brunnett," John supplied in a voice wholly unknown to himself.

"Mr. Brunnett," Tiny repeated pleasantly—she had a wonderful way of saying Brunnett—it had never sounded so well in his ears before.

"No," the man answered, "not exactly; I've had several telephone communications, but you're the first one that was brave enough to face this beastly weather."

"Perhaps I want the job worse than any one else."

John shot an inquisitive glance in the direction of the speaker, suddenly resolving to put her through a test.

"You—you're quite sure you're able to perform the necessary duties of a household?" he asked, forcing himself to speak with authority.

"Quite sure?"

"Can you cook?"

"I'll take a chance on proving that I can."

"Know anything about chickens and cows?"

Tiny looked the speaker square in the eye. "I didn't know you wanted a farm hand."

"Well, I'll be—be——" the man's voice trailed off into a mere whisper, but Tiny knew under his breath was hidden a very impolite "damn."

"Of course," he resumed politely, "I—I—really didn't mean feeding the chickens nor milking the cows," Brunnett said, a sudden fear gripping his heart less he lose sight of the applicant, "but I meant bringing in the eggs and churning and moulding the butter—if necessary."

Tiny smiled. "Oh, yes," she answered quickly, "I could do that—and—just suppose," she continued softly, "that I say I am quite capable of running a house successfully if left undisturbed, what would you consider my services worth?"

John Brunnett hesitated. He wasn't very well acquainted with the female sex at best and this brand of woman was an altogether new specimen to him.

"Speaking from personal experience," he said, forgetting his affected gruffness, "I'd say such an addition to my home would be invaluable, but as a start I'd agree to give you a room on the second floor,—his eyes lingered for a moment on the immaculate white blouse the girl was wearing—"with connecting bath," he added slowly, one afternoon off every week, and Wednesdas and Sunday evenings, and—and—oh, hell! I don't know anything about hiring folks, but if you'll put my house in order and run it you can set your own price."

Tiny choked down the laugh that arose in her throat.

"I'm leaving a sixty-dollar job," she said softly.

"Then we'll make it seventy-five," the man interrupted, "and you can have the automobile on Wednesday afternoon."

Tiny could conceal her mirth no longer, and her merry laugh went resounding through the old room like the tinkle of a silver bell.

"I accept your terms, Mr. Brunnett," she said, sweetly, "and am ready to sign the contract to become effective Monday morning."

"My God! woman," the man exclaimed, remembering his resolve of gruffness, "have a heart—begin work right now—I'm famished, absolutely famished for food right this minute."

Tiny looked down at her thin, soaked shoes—his eyes followed hers—she knew her stockings were damp—so did he—but Tiny was human—she knew he was hungry.

"Suppose we compromise," she said pleasantly. "I'll fix your supper and then catch the train to the city, and if you like, I'll return at my earliest convenience Sunday morning."

Without further argument Brunnett drew forth the agreement, and after carefully reading it over she signed and handed it back to him.

"Now for the kitchen," she said pleasantly.

"This way," the man answered as he passed from the big living-room into a dimly lighted hall.

"It's in an awful mess," he said apologetically as he ushered her in, "but servants are responsible; the last one left day before yesterday without cleaning up and—and—of course, I've been adding dirty dishes to it ever since."

"I would surmise as much," Tiny responded, critically surveying the stacks of dirty dishes and stove utensils that met her gaze at every turn, "but they can be cleaned," she went on as she investigated the well-stocked pantry and mentally made out a tempting menu that could be prepared quickly.

"I think I can manage now," she continued as she lighted the gas. "How many have you in family?"

"How many have I—in family?" the man repeated slowly.

"That's what I asked."

"Well——" he paused for a moment as though undecided what to say—"suppose I tell you I'm all that is left of the Brunnetts?"

"Then I would say you ought to be ashamed of yourself for letting the old name die."

For an instant the man felt inclined to laugh, but on second thought he decided differently.

"You'll find me more trouble than any whole houseful you ever served before," he replied sharply.

"I can imagine as much," Tiny answered gravely, "but—I—I thought I was hiring myself to a family."

"You are," Brunnett declared, "and I'm all of it, and there's no backing out—you've already signed the contract, and—and," he continued in a cross tone, "I'd have you know I'm hard to please. Why, I'm known for miles around," he went on hoarsely, "as the Beast of Blossom Valley, and nothing short of good service will satisfy me; you've signed the contract," he repeated, "now prove your ability as a good cook by preparing me something to eat."

Before Tiny could speak he had disappeared through the doorway and pulled the door to behind him.

For an instant she felt as though the four walls were closing in about her; never had she had such an adventure—never even in the stormiest sort of scenes in the office had anybody spoken so crossly to her—she felt like running away; fear for a moment gripped her heart when the thought of what her friends would say when they learned that she was housekeeper for an unmarried man—a man who called himself a beast, at that. It suddenly dawned upon her that she was taking considerable risks in accepting this new position. Perhaps, after all, she had better break the contract immediately and go back to the office; nobody would ever know that she had applied for such a place.

Swiftly she glanced around the room. A confusion of things greeted her—dirty pans of all sorts and sizes were stacked in the sink—Tiny's love of adventure combined with her inward knowledge of being perfectly able to take care of herself, pleaded for her to take a chance.

"Seems to me this man needs a housekeeper," she murmured softly, "as much as a business firm needs a stenographer—and Lord only knows how much I need a breath of fresh air!"

She lifted the soiled curtains and peeped out. Far to the west lay a chain of hills whose ragged borders were outlined in the golden glow of a winter sunset—the kind that only comes after the storm clouds of a dreary day have passed on.

That one glimpse of glory settled the question of staying on in the woman's mind. Turning back to the littered-up room, she began preparing a good supper, and in spite of the disorderly surroundings—in spite of the Beast whom she was to serve, she felt inclined to sing.

With the few remaining clean dishes she set the table in the dining-room and called the man who had branded himself a beast in her eyes, to supper.

TO BE CONCLUDED IN SEPTEMBER.

"Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

Through the columns of this department free information pertaining to Etiquette, Personal Appearance and kindred subjects will be given in answer to questions by our subscribers, but not more than two questions the same month by any one subscriber. Address Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and give your own full name and address. Name will not be published.

M. K., Honey Dew, W. Va.—If you wrote a falsehood to this boy which turned him against you, it is right that you should ask his pardon for your wrong action. Whether he will forgive you or not we cannot say. This will depend upon his present fondness for you, and upon the seriousness of the falsehood you told him. We hope you have had a lesson. "Nothing wears so well as the truth."

SKINNY V., Logan, O.—When a boy is introduced to you, it is sufficient for you to offer your hand with a bow, a smile and a "How do you do." (2) There are various kinds of public dances. Some are certainly of the kind no respectable and self-respecting girl should attend. We believe you should accept your father's judgment in the matter. There is but one way to judge such a dance: by those who attend it. You should know whether you think it best to choose your friends from those who frequent such dances or from those who stay away.

O. M. J., Holdenville, Okla.—As a girl of thirteen who can say cheerfully that she has had "several fellows," we can only reply that we believe it would be best that you had several fathers or mothers who would give you several spankings. And if this were done, there would be no more "shows" and "holding of hands."

B. T., Emory, Texas.—A seventeen-year-old girl who thinks someone can advise her more wisely than her parents is in an unfortunate situation. If your father and mother consider that you should not yet receive attentions from young men, you should obey them implicitly. You must certainly know that they have your welfare at heart—and have more wisdom than your seventeen years can have given you.

E. J. G., Park City, Mont.—You may say to the girl: "May I have the pleasure of this dance?" or, "Won't you dance this with me, please?"

ROSEBUD, Tenn.—You do not give your age, so we cannot tell if it is your youth which enables you to love two charming young men at the same time. We are sure you will find this a difficult and unsatisfactory state of affairs, and we advise you to try and have your fickle heart make a wise choice by settling upon one of the two. Certainly "blue eyes, golden hair and classy clothes" sounds like the strongest of your two love combinations.

I. R., Benjamin, Texas.—In entering a church, the lady follows the usher down the aisle and the gentleman comes after.

S. B., Mt. Roszelle, Ala.—A girl of fifteen is far too young to think seriously of being engaged. And when she follows such a course secretly, in opposition to her parents' wishes, she is acting most wrongfully. Her disobedience and deceit are preparing unhappiness for her in the future.

FARMER LAD, Bertrand, Nebr.—The saying, "faint heart ne'er won fair lady," has behind it the wisdom of centuries of experience. There is no reason why you should hesitate to offer attentions to this girl. Your letter does not show the lack of education concerning which you express fears. We are sure that if you can talk to this girl as sensibly and earnestly as you wrote to this department, you will find your conversation and attentions welcome—if the girl is of a sort capable of common sense and discrimination.

G. S., Harmon, La.—Do not worry about any set form of words to use when a young man is introduced to you. Offer your hand with a smile, a slight bow and a simple "How do you do." (2) While you are a few pounds above the average for your height, you could not be considered much overweight.

E. B., York, N. D.—We do not think that a girl of sixteen should attend dances with a young man of twenty-one. Wait a while for this—and also to become engaged. (2) Kisses are privileges of affection which you may grant only to your fiance—when you are old enough to have one.

J. C., Deatesville, Ala.—It is so easy at sixteen to fall in love with boys and so hard to have any affection for schoolbooks—at least for some sort of girls, and not the wisest kind. We can only advise you to keep your eyes on your books for the next year or two—and then you will not have to complain of "love at first sight." At sixteen such love is apt to be near-sighted.

ANXIOUS, Blair, Okla.—We cannot attempt to advise you in your difficulty because we do not know what the reasons are which have caused your parents to ask you to give up this young man. They may be the best sort of objections which it would be wise for you to respect. If you wish to obey the wishes of your parents and forget your love affair, it would be well for you to plan a visit to some locality where you may not meet this young man daily and be tempted to the secret meetings which you say now take place. However, you are of age and have the right to judge carefully what you feel may affect your life-happness.

C. O., Laurel Springs, N. C.—You are wise in knowing that at sixteen you should not worry about boys or about the fear of "dying an old maid." Although you are unable to attend school, there are many things which you may teach yourself at home through the reading of the right sort of books.

BROKEN-HEARTED GIRL, Dexter, Ky.—If you wish to make a man want you for his wife, you must take pains to make yourself worth winning. Keep yourself simple and attractive in manner and dress; care for your skin and hair; keep your conversation free from criticism of others, and be gentle and tolerant in all your daily relationships. And remember that every man would prefer that his wife should spell correctly—which means you must take some time for your books that you may now be spending on boys. (2) Yes; a girl may kiss her fiance "good night" when leaving him.

R. N., Granbury, Texas.—As long as you are attending school, you should avoid anything more than relations of simple friendliness between yourself and this young man who is your teacher. We believe you are too apt to take pleasant courtesies of his for interest of a more serious nature. School is no place for love affairs but for something quite different. You should know this, and if your teacher forgets it—he should be reminded of it by someone whose opinion he will heed.

MARJORIE, Billings, Okla.—A young girl should rise if being seated when introduced to an older women. A girl or older woman need not rise when a man is presented unless she should so choose. In the case of an elderly man, or a guest of honor or some man particularly distinguished, a lady would not remain seated during the introduction.

One Cow Equals Five

A New Jersey boy was influenced to buy a high-grade cow for $155. The cow on freshening gave 24 quarts of milk and kept it up for a long period. The father owned five cows, the average cows for the neighborhood. They were fresh in the spring. Their product did not equal the product of the cow owned by the son—five times the labor and five times the feed, in comparison with one good cow.—U. S. Dept. of Agriculture.

ing others for by so doing we are doing a service for Him and may our motto always be, "The Master's Service First."

Will you sit over and let me have a seat near Knot Head? You need not be afraid of me for I have no lecture for you but just want to pat you on the back. I think, as many others will think, that you spoke the truth. Now there are women all over this country of ours that his words do not hit but of the ones he does hit he is only voicing other men's opinions. If some girls, and older women too, did not have so much "gall and brass" they would not go out on the street and in public places dressed (or undressed) in the fashion they do today. Do you know when I see some of them on the street it really makes me ashamed that I am a woman. I heard someone say the other day of a young man, "A decent girl won't go out with him." If I were a young man today and should call on a girl that, as Uncle Charlie says, "was painted like an Indian and wore only enough clothes to make a wristlet for a humming bird," I would certainly tell her I would excuse her till she finished dressing. When they appear on the street the men would do the right thing if they would laugh and jeer at them. Some of you may think me too outspoken but I should like to hear this subject discussed by our brothers as well as the sisters and if others don't voice my opinion you won't hear from me again, but I shall always think I was right anyway.

When I see the pictures of so many dear babies I just feel that I would like to take them in my arms and have a romp with them. There is nothing in the world so sweet as a baby and why we have people who prefer dogs to some little orphan child or one of their own, is more than I can understand. Christ said, "Suffer little children to come unto me and forbid them not for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven."

HOOSIER BRUNETTE.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

As a result of a fall I will be unable to write for some time and beg my COMFORT correspondents to excuse my seeming neglect in answering their cheerful and interesting letters. I hope to do so some time.

To those wishing to learn more about Colorado than told in my letter in June, 1919, COMFORT, please address Frederic J. Haskins, Denver Times, Free Information Bureau, Washington, D. C. He will answer all questions. Enclose stamp for reply.

Sincerely, MRS. E. H. STEED.

ALBERTVILLE, ALA.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

Perhaps you'll be interested in my school. I am teaching about four miles from the railroad station. I have 97 pupils enrolled and for a while had a daily average of 85. There are eight grades, and maybe you are wondering how I managed that many. If I hadn't correlated the work I never could have done it. The 4th and 5th grades recite together, as do the 6th and 7th, and the 1st, 2nd and 3rd. I would let the 3rd grade do part of the work and the 2nd and easier part and so on. I have very little time to supervise study. Our arithmetic, language and drawing are graded and the latter used to help decorate the room for that month. Then it is taken down and we begin anew.

I live about three miles from the schoolhouse and drive a large red mule. I hear someone say, "Does the mule ever run away?" He does, but I don't mind. I have to cross two bridges and a bluff and it seems that I find something new every day. We have begun our study of birds and almost every day we have something to tell about the birds we see on our way to school. There are so many wonderful things among nature that it makes me glad I live among the rocks and hills. Some pleasant day I'll take my pupils and hie away to a bluff where we will gather all kinds of wild flowers for

"I know a place where the sun is like gold,
And the cherry blooms burst with the snow,
And down underneath is the loveliest nook
Where the four-leaf clovers grow.

"One leaf is for love and one is for hope,
And one is for faith, you know,
And God put another in for luck;
If you look you'll find where they grow.

"But you must have faith and you must have hope,
You must love and be strong, and so
If you watch and wait you'll find the place
Where the four-leaf clovers grow."

MRS. ADA KIRBY.

ODENTON, MD.

Hello Everybody:

Any room for sore throaty individuals? Honestly, Mrs. Wilkinson, I'm lonesome enough to bite holes in my pillow—but then, I always was destructive to furniture. Our COMFORT arrived this week and I have read the letters, oh, so many times! I do hope this gets in print because I want to hear from some of you people.

We're having an honest-to-goodness Maryland sand storm today, the kind that makes your arms and legs feel like a windmill in a tornado. I bet Pearl Vesey knows all about them.

Just a word or two to describe this "burg." Odonton starts with a hotel and ends with a grand flourish—at the post office. It's on the outskirts of the big Maryland cantonment, Camp Meade. It is situated with equal convenience to Washington, D. C., Baltimore and Annapolis.

Don't ask me what I look like? Well, I'm about five feet, eight inches tall, eighteen years old and—nuff said! nuff said!

I'd like to say a lot of things before I take another pill—don't tell Mamma, but I hide some of them—but my conscience won't let me! Hope to hear from some of you in the near future. Any Camp Fire Girls over there in the Corner?

With love and best wishes to all,

Very sincerely, SYLVIA MARIE GARY.

Plenty of room for you, Sylvia mine, but not an inch of room for any sore throat germs. If you'll promise not to cough or sneeze or, or—breathe, you may come in. We'd all like to hear from more Camp Fire Girls.—Ed.

PENNSYLVANIA HILL.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND READERS:

I wish "E" of Jacksonville, Florida, would write me. I am placed in somewhat the same position but am not worrying about the man question. I believe but few of them are worth worrying about. Mind I said "few." I am a mother so you see I have something to love and something to live for and I would give up my happiness for my babies if need be. I have relatives near you and you might know them. I am not old nor yet young and not pretty or attractive so will not describe myself.

Say sisters, some one is rapping. Well, here comes Bachelor Bill, just as I had pictured him—a big, fat lawyer. I was going to write you a personal letter but was afraid you would think it was another proposal. I always thought Billy a very pretty name but you and Kaiser Bill have changed my mind. Now don't get excited, I'm not classing you with the Kaiser but you see you have the same name. Bill, I've just been reading Crumbs of COMFORT. Do you ever read them? In case you don't I'll repeat one for you: "Be simple, be unaffected, be honest in your speaking and acting and never use a long word where a short one will do." You see, when your letters appear I have to read them with a dictionary by my side to get the meaning. Please send the key along next time and save my time. Here is Crumb No. 2: "The only time Heaven is deaf is when man's heart is dumb." No. 3: "High office is like a tall monument; only two kinds of creatures are apt to touch the summit, insects and eagles." No. 4: "If every man could read the hearts of his neighbors, more would wish to come down from a high position than rise to it."

Now Bill as you seem to be soaring around in the air I'd like you to find out while you're up there if there is a woman in the moon as well as a man or is he like yourself, so selfish there isn't room for a mate, and does he really live on green cheese? Oh, you "trainer." Train us how to keep our husbands as kind and thoughtful and generous as they were in sweetheart days; also cure them of "Alcoholic Blues." Don't come back with a lecture for me for breaking up an American home for it wasn't a full-blooded American home then but it is now, there's no more Germany for me. In the marriage vow it says you must obey your husbands so when mine ordered me to go I went. The divorce was his part of it and after King John Barleycorn left he repented, but it was too late. Happiness for me and my babies who are not "red-faced, bald-headed buds of humanity, but little beams of sunshine from Heaven. [illegible] don't walk the nightly floor either and form for them [illegible]ad habit. It's the parents who are wrong in cases like that, not the babies. Part of my business is caring for these "buds of humanity" and their mothers and I find in my travels that even a hard-hearted man is proud to be called Father. It makes him feel far [illegible] to his old self. I've just been in a home where there were six humanity buds and Rockefeller couldn't buy one of the six out of the heart of the father. Just think Bill what a sweet little bud you once were.

Here's wishing you all prosperity and happiness.

A MERRY WIDOW.

Merry Widow.—If misery loves company then ignorance does as well and it is comforting to know I'm not the only ignoramus in the Sisters' Corner. When I read Bill's letters I say to myself, "Dear, dear, I wonder what that word means. I'll have to look it up."—Ed.

ROBBINSDALE, R. R. 2, MINN.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have been a COMFORT reader ever since I was able to read as my mother had it in the old home for years. I wish it came once a week instead of once a month.

I live in a small place, five miles from Minneapolis. We have over three acres of land, consisting of twelve lots, which my husband and I keep up ourselves. In the winter and spring months he works till planting time. We keep over two hundred chickens. We have ten apple trees, two cherry and two plum trees and have put one lot in strawberries as I think it will pay. Last year one man made $45.00 every week while berries lasted, on a patch no larger than 10x14 feet.

Train service is not as convenient as it might be; nevertheless a person can get into Minneapolis by ten in the forenoon and have a good day's shopping done by the time the train leaves at four-twenty. Minnesota is noted for its beautiful lakes. All last summer we drove our Overland car to every lake near home. The Minnehaha Falls, mentioned by Longfellow in Hiawatha, are beautiful. Steps are so built that the visitors are enabled to go down to the bottom for a better view. Lake Calhoun and Lake of the Isles are very pretty while Lake Como is the most picturesque.

I am five feet, six inches tall and never weighed more than 113 pounds. Have dark brown hair, brown eyes and a fair complexion. Two years ago I lost my foot at the ankle so am wearing an artificial foot but do all my housework, washing, ironing and care for my two children as well as tend to my garden. My children are seven and five years of age. Marie goes to the district school out here and likes it very much. Edna Jane stays home with me. It will be lonesome for me when she goes to school.

If there is any sister who knows the song, "A Convict's Christmas Night," I wish she would send the words to me. I should like the music, too. The chorus begins, "He sees a long fire's cheerful glow."

If it isn't asking too much, will someone send me samples of crocheting for pillow slips and children's underclothes? I will return favor any way I can.

MRS. LAWRENCE DE NELL.

OKOLONA, MISS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT READERS:

I love dear old COMFORT and always read it from cover to cover and I think even the small "crumbs" are fine.

How many of our COMFORT readers have to move this year? We are getting ready for the awful task. I say "we" for I've the dearest baby girl and a mighty good husband, Clem. Baby's name is Annie May and she was one year old the third day of May. I don't live far from home folks and can see them often. My mother and father-in-law died before I was married. I have the best of neighbors and they have been very good to me.

We live six miles from the little town of Okolona, not far from a good high school and there is also a good church near.

Lovingly, MRS. W. C. WILLIAMS.

HOWARD, N. Y.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

Here on the paths of every day—
Here on the common human way
Is all the stuff the gods would take
To build a Heaven to mould and make
New Edens. Ours the stuff sublime
To build Eternity in time!

I think Mrs. Ray Drain must have read that. How hard she has worked! But I think she enjoys the fruits of her labors.

Why Women Are Gaining Prominence In the Business And Political Life of Today

They Are the Ones With Red Blood, Strength and Endurance While Others Who Let Their Blood Starve for Want of Iron Remain Weak Delicate and Run-Down—Physician Explains

HOW NUXATED IRON HELPS GIVE WOMEN RENEWED HEALTH, VIM AND VITALITY

By Enriching The Blood And Creating Thousands of New Red Blood Cells—It Often Increases The Strength In Two Weeks' Time

Not long ago the first woman member was elected to the House of Commons in England. We have our own woman member of Congress. Another woman has been made a judge. The other day a large Chicago firm opened an important branch in New York and sent a woman to take charge. A notable gathering of capitalists recently gave to a woman the entire management of a large business organization. Everywhere women are coming to the front. No longer is theirs a limited field. And for all this there is one reason. Women are looking after their health and the very fact of building greater physical power is acting as an aid to the development of increased mentality. It is the strong, healthy, steady nerved women with pure red blood—rich in iron—who are carving names for themselves in the business and political life of today. They are gaining prizes that would not have been dreamed of a quarter of a century ago when the quiet pursuits of womankind demanded far less strength, energy and endurance than now.

Yet there are still thousands of women who allow themselves to remain weak, nervous and run-down simply because they do not know how to renew their failing strength. Unless such women find a way to get plenty of outdoor exercise and follow a different manner of living or take some other steps which will put more iron into their blood, they are bound to look pale, haggard and worn and show signs of age at a time when they should still be young in feeling and attractive in appearance. In such cases the administration of simple Nuxated Iron will often increase the strength and endurance of weak, nervous, run-down women in two weeks' time and make them look years younger.

Dr. Kenneth K. MacAlpine, a prominent New York Surgeon, member of the New York State Medical Society and for 16 years Adjunct Professor of the New York Post Graduate Medical School and Hospital, says: "You can tell the women whose blood is rich in strength-giving iron, they are the beautiful, healthy, rosy-cheeked ones, radiant with life, vim and energy—envied and sought after everywhere they go. Yet despite all that has been said and written by physicians about the alarming iron deficiency in the blood of the average American woman of today, there are still thousands who need something to increase their red-blooded corpuscles and build up their strength and endurance and are either careless of their condition or do not know what to take. In my opinion there is nothing better than organic iron—Nuxated Iron—to help make healthy, full-blooded, beautiful women. By enriching the blood and increasing its oxygen-carrying power Nuxated Iron will often transform the flabby flesh, toneless tissues, and pallid cheeks of nervous run-down women into a glow of health and make them look years younger within a surprisingly short time."

If you are not strong or well you owe it to yourself to make the following test: See how long you can work or how far you can walk without becoming tired. Next take two five-grain tablets of ordinary Nuxated Iron three times per day after meals for two weeks. Then test your strength again and see how much you have gained.

Manufacturers' Note: Nuxated Iron, which is prescribed and recommended above by physicians, is not a secret remedy, but one which is well known to druggists everywhere. Unlike the older inorganic iron products, it is easily assimilated and does not injure the teeth, make them black, nor upset the stomach. The manufacturers guarantee successful and entirely satisfactory results to every purchaser or they will refund your money. It is dispensed by all good druggists.

Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Subscribers are invited to write to this department asking for any information desired relative to the treatment of animal troubles. Questions will be answered in these columns free by an eminent veterinarian. Describe the trouble fully, sign full name and give your address; direct all correspondence to the Veterinary Department, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

Treating Sore Teats

WHEN a cow comes up from pasture with one of her teats badly torn do not at once apply axle grease, or other ointment. Put her in a stanchion, then get some hot water from the house and in it put all the boric acid it will dissolve. Now cleanse the teat and cut away every particle of ragged skin or tissue and remove all foreign bodies. Next immerse the teat for five minutes in the hot boric acid solution and afterward dry gently. When this has been done, paint the wound with tincture of iodin, dust it with boric acid, apply thin layer of absorbent cotton and keep that in place with strips of surgeons' tape. Twice daily, for three or four days it will then be necessary to draw the milk from that quarter by means of a milking tube. To prevent infecting the teat, boil the tube for twenty minutes each time before use. If the wound is quite large, better bandage the teat spirally with surgeons' tape, over the cotton. The teat tube then will have to be used a few times and then milking may be done gently by hand with the tape in place. Remove the tape in a week, then apply benzoated oxide of zinc ointment, if healing is not complete. Taking stitches in the teat sometimes is necessary. When it has been carefully done, iodoform should be dusted on the wound and iodoform-collodion applied as a varnish. Badly treated wounds of this sort often end in a troublesome fake opening or fistula of the milk duct and that necessitates an operation.

When a teat is seen to be sore, immerse it night and morning for five minutes or so in the hot boric acid solution; then dry gently and apply a mixture of equal quantities of carbolized vaseline and benzoated oxide of zinc ointment in which has been thoroughly mixed a dram of subnitrate of bismuth. In obstinate cases, prefer strong iodin ointment applied twice daily. Other very useful applications are: One part tannic acid to seven parts glycerine, or one part balsam of Peru and three parts alcohol.

SELF-SUCKING COW.—I have a young cow that suckles herself. She has had the habit one year. What is the cause and what can I do to prevent it?
MISS B. B.

A.—Put an old horsecollar on the cow and she will probably be unable to suck herself. If this does not suffice, attach sharpened pickets to the collar so that they will prod the skin when the cow turns her head around. The cause simply is calf-appetite for milk which has not been forgotten.

ECZEMA.—I have a rabbit and about a week ago her ears became filled with scabs and, at the bottom of the ear it is very hard. The hair commenced to come off where she laid her ears on her back and the flesh became scabby. What is the trouble and what can I do? J. F.

A.—This probably is eczema, but parasitic mange is a possibility. Cleanse the parts perfectly and then rub in sulphur ointment at intervals of three days.

LEAKING OF MILK.—I have a cow seven years old. Her milk flows freely before milking time. Please tell me the cause and give me a remedy, if any.
MRS. J. M. S.

A.—Milk three times daily. If that does not suffice, immerse the teats in strong alum solution night and morning, and if that does not avail, apply melted wax or paraffin to the tips of the teats. Flexible collodion is applied in the worst cases. Stop its use when the tips of the teats become irritated.

TUMORS.—I have two hogs in fine condition that have large lumps on their back. It doesn't seem to hurt them when pressed on. Please tell me what is the matter and give remedy. MRS. S. B.

A.—The lumps may be fatty or fibroid tumors but we cannot determine that without making an examination. An operation scarcely would be profitable and the hogs should be slaughtered for meat, when in fit condition. If it is possible, have a trained veterinarian present at killing time to decide if there is any serious disease present which would unfit the meat for use.

OBSTRUCTED TEAT.—I have a good Jersey cow that has recently had a second calf. One of her front teats is larger than the rest and seems to be full of wind, the milk running into it very slowly. She flinches a little when first starting to milk. I can only milk a few spoonfuls at first and then it is dry. I do that several times before I finish milking her. MRS. D. C.

A.—We should advise you to "dry off" the milk secretion in that quarter as a growth high up in the teat no doubt has caused the condition described. The only treatment for that would be to have the growth removed by cutting through the walls of the teat when the cow is dry. Such an operation is formidable and only to be attempted by a trained veterinarian. We scarcely think it would pay you to have it done. When the growth is at the tip of the teat, its surgical removal is a comparatively simple matter.

THUMPS; SORE TEATS.—I have a horse that jerks or thumps when he gets too warm from plowing. What would be good for him? (2) I have a cow that has a sore as large as a twenty-five cent piece on the end of each teat. I think they have been frozen. Please give remedy. N. M. D.

A.—Clip the coat if it is long and rough. Do not work the horse in the hot part of the day. Put a white sheet on his body and shade his head if he has to work in the sun. Do not feed any bulky roughage at noon. Allow a little cool drinking water often when he is at work and do not work him just after a meal. (2) Twice daily for five minutes immerse the sore teats in hot water containing all the boric acid it will dissolve. Then wipe dry and apply a mixture of equal quantities of carbolized vaseline and benzoated oxide of zinc ointment, adding one dram of subnitrate of bismuth to the ounce. If that does not suffice, apply strong iodin ointment twice daily.

NERVOUSNESS.—I have a sow, one year old, which farrowed five weeks ago. She was all right before but shakes as though she were frozen. Her appetite appears to be all right. Please tell me the cause and what to do. MRS. L. F. T.

A.—We suspect that the sow is afflicted with chorea (St. Vitus'), which might be brought on by farrowing. It is incurable, but she may improve if you wean the pigs and let her graze green crops and also allow milk and access to middlings, shelled corn and tankage from a self-feeder.

TUBERCULOSIS.—I have a cow seven years old. She seems to rattle in her lungs and her eyes are bad. When she coughs, there is a discharge from her nose. When she drinks, she puts her mouth to the water, she sips up a little and then lets it run from her mouth. What is wrong and what is best to do? E. B.

A.—We assume that a cow is affected in the way described and if so we should consider it a plain case of tuberculosis which is incurable and contagious and renders the milk dangerous for persons or animals. If you think the animal worth the expense you might have a veterinarian apply the tuberculin test to determine the matter. We cannot prescribe treatment that would help.

INDIGESTION.—I have a heavy work horse nine years old that I bought last spring. He was worked hard all winter, and was well fed. He is thin and will eat all you give him and beg for more. I think his kidneys are weak as he urinates often and rests on one hip when standing. C. F. R.

A.—Have his teeth put in order by a veterinarian and clip the coat if it is long and coarse. Then feed whole or crushed oats and one-ninth part of wheat bran by weight, allowing one pound of the mixture for each hundred pounds of body weight as a day's ration in three feeds. Allow a similar amount of hay, but only feed a pound or so of it at noon if the horse has to work hard and do not work him immediately after a meal. Allow free access to rock salt. If urination then occurs too often, mix in the feed twice daily 30 grains of iodide of potash for five consecutive days a week.

QUIDDING OF HORSE.—I have a horse eleven years old that chews his hay but doesn't swallow it. He doesn't care for oats but likes corn. He is always biting himself on his right side. He very seldom lies down. W. A. P.

A.—The horse is afflicted with chronic indigestion, and the cause is inability properly to masticate feed. That also accounts for the "quidding" of hay. A diseased, split or long molar tooth is the probable cause, or all of the molars (grinders) may be needing attention. Have a veterinarian put the teeth in order and all of the symptoms described should soon disappear.

BONE SPAVIN.—I have a mare, eight years old, that weighs about 1,000 pounds. She has a hard lump on the inside of her right hind leg on the lower part of hock joint, about the size of an English walnut. After standing and when she first starts, she is lame, or if she is made to turn around quickly. Can you tell me what it is and give a remedy? C. L. S.

A.—You have described a bone spavin and the sort of lameness it usually causes. It would be best to have the spavin and entire hock joint fired and blistered by a trained veterinarian and then tie the mare up short for a six weeks' rest. This should not, however, be done in very hot weather. If you cannot have the case treated by an expert, some good possibly may be done by clipping the hair from the hock and spavin, tying the mare up short and applying a blister two or three times at intervals of three or four weeks until lameness subsides.

BLOOD IN MILK.—I have two cows which bleed from their hind teats when milked. Both are in a healthy condition. What causes it and what will prevent it?
MRS. J. B.

A.—Growths in the teats probably become irritated and bleed at milking time. The only remedy is to have the growths removed by operation. If that cannot be done, the affected cow should be allowed to nurse calves, or the milk secretion should be dried off and the cow fitted for slaughter.

Milly, I wish we lived near each other and that I could help you. Don't you think you can keep your promise to God and still have friends? Just be a friend and see if you don't have lots of them; forget yourself just once and laugh and talk. You are mistaken when you say no one wants your friendship. You wonder how you appear and wishing to leave a good impression you are self conscious. Why do you not tell your sister that she does not use you right. Maybe she does not realize she is hurting your feelings. Let her know you like a good time and go to entertainments as often as you like. I wish you lots of happiness.

B. of Goshen, California. I don't agree with you. Some women cannot and others should not have children. Do you think a woman who nearly gives her life to bring a child into the world and suffers for months after should bring four children into the world? Do you think a person should have more children than she can care for and keep clean and give an education? I want my children to be neat, happy and educated, and I know I cannot attend to any more than I have now. I want them to learn to work but I don't want them to leave school at the age of twelve and go to work as I had to do when I was that age. I have been through the mill and life for a young girl alone is hard. I have often wondered how I kept pure and good; there are so many stumbling blocks placed in a girl's path, not by boys of their own age but by men who are old enough to know better.

Love to all. JUST A WHITE ROSE.

RIVER EDGE, N. J.

DEAR COMFORT FRIENDS:

I didn't think that my letter in a recent issue of COMFORT would bring such a response from all over the country. So far I have received over 250 letters which interested me greatly, but I am grieved to say that it will be utterly impossible to answer all. However, I will try my best to reach some of you, but will ask of you who do not receive an answer from me to accept my best thanks. Since writing my last letter I was married, which leaves very little time to spare.

Again thanking all, and with the best wishes, I remain, MARION BAIER TABOR.

CLARK SUMMIT, PA.

DEAR SISTER WILKINSON:

There are many problems discussed in the Sisters' Corner and I wish you would bring up the subject of woman's overalls. Personally I am in favor of them. I don't know what I would do without them. The freedom from skirts hanging around one is a blessing, whether in the garden or in the house. As most farm women have chores to do they will find it fine to have on a garment where perfect freedom of movement is possible. They button at the ankle and on the hips, bib front with straps in the back. Mine are medium blue in color. They are cheaper than house dresses and look much neater. You will see many women in dresses that have a few inches of the petticoats hanging below the dress. Just put the kitchen mirror on the floor and see your feet as others see them. Our store calls these garments "farmerettes." I've been told that Chicago mail-order houses have them with the bungalow apron top.

Best wishes. MRS. J. B.

KINGMAN, R. R. 3, KANS.

DEAR READERS AND BABIES:

Being the mother of a family, I am going to make a plea for the babies. I hope I know what I am talking about. So many babies are bottle fed nowadays though when I was a baby it wasn't common. Some of mine were raised that way. And let me say right here that I haven't anything to sell or give away.

We raised two children on cow's milk and different baby feeds and just when we'd think we had found something that agreed with it, baby would be taken sick. Now I think after raising one that way and seeing several others, that goat's milk comes the nearest to breast milk of anything. At birth my baby weighed only three and one half pounds. We had tried to get a goat for our boy but could not find one, but a short time before baby was born we succeeded in getting one and I gave the milk to baby and it agreed with her. At fifteen months she weighed nineteen pounds and everyone says she is the picture of health. She has rosy cheeks and has never been sick. I mixed one half boiled water with the milk. Be careful not to overfeed. Evaporated goat's milk can be used but that, of course, takes more water. Our youngest boy drinks the milk, and he is only two and one half pounds heavier than baby.

One has to arrange to have two goats so as to have a year's supply of milk. I have had Angora goats, but the native goats could be used though they do not give as much milk as the milk breeds. I also use the milk for cooking. We have several goats now and one pure bred buck. We use the milk and raise the kids on cow's milk. Goats do not easily take the diseases of cattle and are never tubercular. Even if one buys a native goat, with clean feed and plenty of it, they give more milk than one would expect for their body weight. I strongly urge clean feed for goats; unless starved to it, they won't eat dirty feed and the care of a goat reacts on the baby. The meat of goats is good for food. Don't let any false idea about goats keep you from using their milk for your baby. If anyone wishes more information I shall be glad to answer all I can if those writing enclose a stamp.

Thanks for the good listeners, and good by until we meet next time.

MRS. D. GILCHRIST.

LURAY, VA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I am sending you this little poem hoping you will print it in COMFORT. It may help brighten some weary sister's days or shed a little sunshine into some darkened life. How true it is, but how often we neglect it, if we would only give someone in distress a cheery smile or comforting word. It would work wonders. How careless we are in that respect, when it would gladden their hearts and ours too.

God bless you Mrs. Wilkinson for the good you are doing and the universal love you have brought about among the many readers of COMFORT and may you continue for a long, long time yet.

Sincerely yours, MISS SADIE E. W. PRINTZ.

Sing by the Way

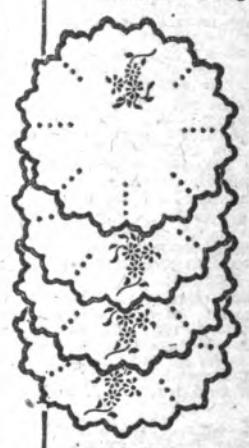
"Sing in the morning's glory,
Sing in the noontide heat,
Sing in the shaded gloaming,
When day and darkness meet!
Sing when the heart is saddest;
Sing in its glad delight;
Sing, for the Lord has promised
Songs in the darkest night!

"Sing when the soul is burdened
With thoughts of coming pain;
Some other heart in sorrow
May catch the sweet refrain!
Sing as the days pass onward,
'Til life becomes divine;
And then the angel chorus
Will be your song and mine!"

UNITED STATES.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I enjoy your letters so much and you give such good advice that I am going to you with my troubles.



When my little two-year-old girl wants anything she cries as loud as she can. We explain why she cannot have it and she cries all the louder. We have whipped her, ignored her, tried to attract her attention elsewhere but it doesn't do any good. If we are away from home and my husband leaves us she wants to stay in my lap all the time and as I have an eight-months'-old baby it makes it rather hard for me. If any one comes and he goes out of the house she acts the same way—and he says I'm selfish because I want him to stay and help me with them. I never go anywhere without one of them.

My mother is totally blind and very weak. She lives with her children as father is dead. My husband wants me to go West with him to live. Should I go or stay close to mother and help care for her? He says we will be able to do more for her if we go there but I

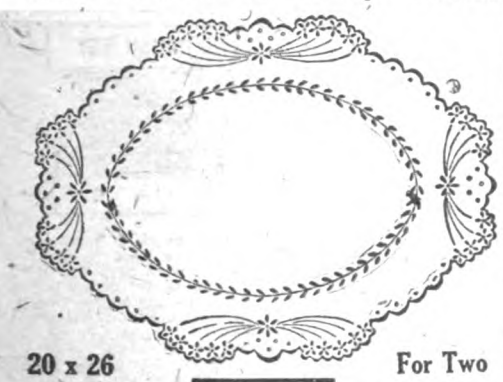
Tray Cloth



Stamped On Fine Material

THIS handsome new design will please our women readers. It is 10x16 inches in size and comes stamped on fine linen-finished cotton cloth, all ready for embroidering. It may be worked in light shades if desired, but looks more attractive when done all in white. The basket may be worked in solid embroidery, French knots or eyelets, the spray in solid embroidery or satin stitch, while the customary buttonhole stitch is used for the scalloped border. We will give you this attractive Tray Cloth if you will accept the following offer:

A Handsome Tray Cloth

20 x 26 Inches — Premium No. 8492 — For Two Subscriptions

We call the above one of the handsomest designs in a tray-cloth we have yet seen to say nothing of its large size, which is 20 x 26 inches and yet in spite of its size it does not require an unusual amount of work to finish it. The stitches themselves are simple as it may be worked either in solid or eyelet embroidery with buttonhole edge. It looks the neatest when worked all in white, although one or more colors may be used if desired. This extra large, attractive tray-cloth comes stamped on pure white "Butcher cloth" which in reality is very fine linen finished cotton—a material which has the appearance of pure linen and will if anything give longer service. We will make you a present of this tray-cloth upon the terms of the following special

Complete Crochet Outfit Given

THIS offer is for the woman and girl who "loves her crocheting" and insists upon having the best of everything to work with. In this outfit we give you any desired quantity of Dexter Cordonnette "Silko" crochet and tatting cotton, and three of the highest grade crochet needles. There is no better crochet and tatting cotton than Dexter "Silko"—a fact already known to thousands of our women readers. It is made of the best Sea Island cotton with a twist that makes it lie flat, is highly mercerized and actually improves with washing. It is smooth to the fingers and will not kink. With Dexter "Silko," crocheting is more easily done—and the finished pieces are far more beautiful and useful than if made with cheaper grade cotton. Dexter "Silko" for crocheting comes in all the popular colors—white, ecru, pink, rose pink, light blue, delph blue, king blue, sapphire and sea green, and in sizes 3, 10, 30, 50 and 70. The tatting cotton comes in the same colors and of the size always used for this work.

The three steel crochet needles are the finest made, 5 inches long, nickel plated, perfectly formed and balanced, with flattened finger hold, and a nickel cap that slips on over the end, protecting it when not in use. This cap also prevents the sharp point from doing any damage when carried in the pocket, handbag or work basket. We give you three different sizes of needles—8, 10 and 12.

We believe that our crochet workers will appreciate this offer, as it means a considerable saving to be able to secure such an outfit as this without expense. We will send you this complete outfit, also additional quantities of the crochet and tatting cotton free upon the terms of the following special offers.

Offer No. 8563. For three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you the three crochet needles, one ball of Dexter "Silko" crochet cotton and three balls of Dexter "Silko" tatting cotton free by parcel post prepaid, Please be sure to give color and size wanted. Premium No. 8563.

Offer No. 8251. We will furnish you with extra balls of the crochet cotton at the rate of two balls for one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents, sent by parcel post prepaid. Please be sure to give color and size wanted. Premium No. 8251.

B. W., Oklahoma.—Upon your statements, we are of the opinion that the man who gave your husband the note you mention can be compelled to pay same in the proper action brought to enforce the payment of the same, provided he has property sufficient, not exempt by law from levy under execution.

M. R., Kentucky.—We think your rights, under the insurance policy on your husband's life, would depend upon the terms of the policy and the manner in which the same was issued. We think you should have the same examined by some competent expert.

L. E. F., California.—If, as you state, the man who died in Ohio left his wife only a life estate in his property, we do not think she could legally dispose of, by will or otherwise, any greater interest in the property than she herself received. We think it would have been necessary for her to have held more than a life estate in the property in order to have legally disposed of the same by will. We think an executor of an estate can be compelled to account after a reasonable time has been allowed, for the administration of an estate.

L. J. M., Arkansas.—We think that the children of first cousins are second cousins to each other. We do not think that marriages between second cousins are prohibited in your state.

A. B. C., Montana.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the consent of the parents is necessary, in most instances, to the adoption of their children by some other person. We think a merchant has a legal right to charge interest upon his accounts after same have remained unpaid a period of time, provided he notifies his customers of his intention to do so.

E. H. D., Indiana.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that it is possible to acquire good title to real estate through a tax sale, and we think you should have an examination made of the title you mention in order to determine whether you have good title to the property you mention. We do not think the owner of a dower right in this property could convey good title to the fee of the property.

MRS. J. O., Iowa.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the parents of an adult daughter are under no obligations to support her and her children, and they can legally refuse to provide a home for her if they so desire; we think she is, however, entitled to such property in the home as belongs to her individually.

MRS. W. T. R., Arkansas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving a surviving widow and children, his widow would receive homestead rights for life in the homestead, unless she is the owner of a homestead in her own right, and dower of a one-third interest for life in his other real estate, and one third of his personal property absolutely.

MRS. L. D., South Carolina.—We think you should make your complaint against the mail carrier you mention to the Post-Office Department at Washington, D. C.

J. M. G., Oklahoma.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the consent of the parents or guardian is necessary for the marriage of females under 18 years of age.

S. D., Tennessee.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of an unmarried woman, leaving no will, and leaving no descendant or parent, her estate would be divided among her brothers and sisters in equal shares, the children of any deceased brother or sister taking their parent's share; we do not think the husband of a sister who predeceased the decedent would have any interest in her estate, except that he might in turn inherit from the estate of one of his children who had received a share of the aunt's estate.

R. W., Illinois.—Under the laws of Missouri, we are of the opinion that a married man cannot, by will, bar his widow from dower in his real estate, unless some provision in place of dower, in such will, is accepted by the widow.

MRS. J. H. H., Ohio.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the statute of limitations runs against any promise for the payment of money, in writing, within fifteen years, and against actions based upon a contract or agreement to pay, not in writing, within six years; that a judgment is a lien upon real estate for five years after the issuing of the last execution to enforce its payment, but may be revived and another execution issued thereon, but action to revive a dormant judgment must be brought within twenty-one years after it becomes dormant. We do not think a judgment can be enforced against any greater interest in real estate than the judgment debtor had in such real estate and if the judgment debtor had but a life estate in the real estate the judgment would not be a lien upon the property after the death of such judgment debtor.

MRS. W. H. C., Texas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that, in cases where the parents are separated, the courts have power to ward the custody of the children to either of the parents, taking into consideration the best interest and welfare of such children.

W. F. W., Kansas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that your employer, after making an agreement with you as to your rate of wages, cannot substantiate a claim at some later time that he had reduced the amount of your pay without speaking to you about it and getting your consent.

MRS. H. B. S., West Virginia.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving a surviving widow and children, his widow would be entitled to receive dower of a one-third interest for life in his real estate, and one third of the surplus of the personal property, after payment of debts and expenses, absolutely, and we do not think the husband can, by will, bar his widow from this share in his estate; we think the property presented by the husband to his wife becomes her property and subject to her rights therein; we do not think he can later dispose of the property presented his wife, without her consent.

MRS. B. B. G., Nebraska.—Upon your statements we are of the opinion that the woman you mention should have prosecuted the doctor you mention for his misconduct at the time he was guilty of the offense you mention.

A. T., Illinois.—Under the laws of Kansas, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving a surviving widow and one child as his only heirs at law and next of kin, his whole estate would go in equal shares to such wife and child; his brothers and sisters would not be heirs at law and next of kin in case he left a widow and child as such widow and child are nearer relatives.

MRS. C. E. R., Michigan.—We are of the opinion that a testator must possess testamentary capacity and be of sound mind in order to make a valid will, and that a will executed by a person lacking these essentials would, upon the establishment of such facts by the proper evidence, be set aside, and that his estate would then be distributed under the terms of any former last will and testament he might have unrevoked in case same was not subject to the same objection, or if he left no valid will his estate would be disposed of as provided by the intestacy laws of his state.

MRS. W. Georgia.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of the husband, without a will and without a surviving child or descendant, the widow is sole heir to his estate.

Mother Love Is Supreme

Text—The world, regardless of race, or color, or condition, admires a real thing. Mere superficiality has never brought true success and never will.

A WORLD-FAMOUS singer appeared one night in a Kansas town before a house crowded to the door with people who had paid from two to five dollars to hear her warble eight or nine songs. Few of the men or women in her audience had seen her before but her very name was a magnet and they gave up their money eagerly. A hush fell upon the audience when the prima donna came upon the stage. She was everything her pictures had promised; statuesque, beautiful as some flawless picture and gowned as Kansas had never dreamed of gowning. When she sang, each note was as divinely beautiful as her face. The applause was long and loud, still her audience went home cold, unmoved, also somewhat perplexed as to whether they had received their money's worth. Every musical critic in town conceded next morning that such a voice had never been heard in Kansas before, yet folks who had listened to the celebrity went about with a cold chill hanging over them for twenty-four hours which quinine and whisky did not touch.

A few weeks later came Shumann-Heinck. Playgoers in town looked thoughtfully at their two-and five-dollar bills but few of them stayed at home for in that prairie town music is a passion. When the trifling numbers which usher in a star's appearance were finished, a hush fell upon the house. From the wings came five small toddlers, children of leading citizens in town, almost hidden behind armfuls of roses. At the other side of the stage the prima donna made her appearance, beaming as only Schumann-Heinck can in sheer happiness over being alive, prosperous and possessing a voice to which the world listens with breathless delight. She started in nobly to make the graceful obeisance demanded of a prima donna, then she caught sight of the children. She paused for a moment, dropped her fan on the piano, and ran across the stage to where they stood huddled together, too frightened to make their offering of flowers. She lifted the blossoms from their arms, laid them on the floor, then knelt to put her arms about the children, hugging and kissing each one with big hearty smacks which could be heard in the gallery. She seemed loath to let them go, and with tears glistening in her eyes, watched them sidle hurriedly through the wings. The audience understood, nearly everyone in the house had heard of the little Heincks, although no one was certain whether there were nine or twenty-nine of them. Mother love shone in every dimple of the wholesome German face and warmed her heart so that Schumann-Heinck sang as if she had been inspired not only the regulation group on her program but twenty-one songs which swept the gamut of human emotion from "Samson and Delilah" to "Kathleen Mavourneen." Between each number she was greeted by such storms of applause as had never before shaken the old opera house. As people thronged from the lobby, even foresworn enemies beamed at each other.

"What was it?" asked a woman of her husband while they walked home in the moonlight, "that made us all feel as we did tonight? The other prima donna was far more beautiful than the German woman and her voice was as wonderful."

"Yes," acquiesced the man, "only Schumann-Heinck taught us a lesson tonight which every woman ought to lay to heart. She is absolutely natural, and the human being who dares be that gets a clinch on hearts no matter where she stands, beside our fireplace or on the other side of the footlights."

The Convict Ship

By Thomas Kibble Hervey

Morn on the water! and, purple and bright,
Bursts on the billows the flushing of light;
O'er the glad waves, like a child of the sun,
See, the tall vessel goes gallantly on;
Full to the breeze she unbosoms her sail,
And her pennon streams onward, like hope in a gale;
The winds come round her, in murmur and song,
And the surges rejoice as they bear her along;

See! she looks up to the golden-edged clouds,
And the sailor sings gaily aloft in the shrouds.
Onward she glides, amid ripple and spray,
Over the waters, and far away!
Bright as the visions of youth, ere they part,
Passing away, like a dream of the heart!
Who, as the beautiful pageant sweeps by,
Music around her, and sunshine on high,
Pauses to think, amid glitter and glow,
Oh! there be hearts that are breaking below!

Night on the waves! and the moon is on high,
Hung like a gem on the brow of the sky,
Treading its depths in the power of her might,
And turning the clouds, as they pass her, to light.
Look to the waters asleep on their breast,
Seems not the ship like an island of rest?
Bright and alone on the shadowy main,
Like a heart-cherished home on some desolate plain.

Who, as she smiles in the silvery light,
Spreading her wings on the bosom of night,
Alone on the deep, as the moon in the sky,
A phantom of beauty, could dream, with a sigh,
That so lovely a thing is the mansion of sin,
And that souls that are smitten lie bursting within?

Who, as he watches her silently gliding,
Remembers that wave after wave is dividing
Bosoms that sorrow and guilt could not sever,
Hearts which are parted and broken forever?
Or deems that he watches—afloat on the wave,
The death-bed of hope, or the young spirit's grave?

Genuine Aspirin

Name "Bayer" means genuine

Say "Bayer"—Insist!

BAYER

Say "Bayer" when buying Aspirin. Then you are sure of getting true "Bayer Tablets of Aspirin"—genuine Aspirin proved safe by millions and prescribed by physicians for over twenty years. Accept only an unbroken "Bayer package" which contains proper directions to relieve Headache, Toothache, Earache, Neuralgia, Rheumatism, Colds and Pain. Handy tin boxes of 12 tablets cost few cents. Druggists also sell larger "Bayer packages." Aspirin is trade mark of Bayer Manufacture Monoaceticacidester of Salicylicacid.

'Tis thus with our life, while it passes along,
Like a vessel at sea, amidst sunshine and song;
Gaily we glide, in the gaze of the world,
With streamers afloat, and with canvas unfurled,
All gladness and glory to wandering eyes,
Yet, chartered by sorrow, and freighted with sighs.

Fading and false is the aspect it wears,
The smiles we put on, just to cover our tears,
And the withering thoughts which the world cannot know,
Like heartbroken exiles, lie burning below;
While the vessel drives on to that desolate shore
Where the dreams of our childhood are vanished and o'er.

The Gypsy Trail

The white moth to the closing vine,
The bee to the op'ning clover,
And the gypsy blood to the gypsy blood
Ever the wide world over;
Ever the wild world over, lass,
Ever the trail held true,
Over the world and under the world,
And back at last to you.

Out of the luck of the gypsy camp,
Out of the grim and the gray,
Morning waits at the end of the world,
Gypsy, come away!
Back to the road again, again,
Out of a clean sea track,
Follow the cross of the gypsy trail,
Over the world and back!

Follow the Romany patteran,
West to the sinking sun,
Till the junksails lift,
Through the homeless drift,
And the east and the west are one.
Follow the Romany patteran,
East where the silence broods,
By a purple wave on an opal beach

In the hush of the Mabim woods.
The wild hawk to the wind-swept sky,
The deer to the wholesome wold,
And the heart of a man to the heart of a maid,
As it was in the days of old.
Light of my tents be fleet,
Morning waits at the end of the world
And the world is all at our feet.

Once in a While

Once in a while the sun shines out,
And the arching skies are a perfect blue;
Once in a while, 'mid clouds of doubt,
Hope's brightest stars come peeping through.
Our paths lead down by the meadows fair,
Where the sweetest blossoms nod and smile,
And we lay aside our cross of care,
Once in a while.

Once in a while within our own
We clasp the hand of a steadfast friend;
Once in a while we hear a tone
Of love, with the heart's own voice to blend;
And the dearest of all our dreams come true,
And on life's way is a golden mile,
Each thirsting flower is kissed with dew,
Once in a while.

Once in a while in the desert sand
We find a spot of the fairest green;
Once in a while from where we stand
The hills of Paradise are seen;
And a perfect joy in our hearts we hold,
A joy that the world cannot defile;
We trade earth's dross for the purest gold,
Once in a while.

New Crochet And Sweater Books

HUNDREDS of new, lovely designs for COMFORT crochet workers. The very latest patterns in edges, beadings, insertions and laces, crocheted and knitted sweaters, all with complete directions and illustrated by large, clear photographs of the finished work. Each book is 8 by 11 inches in size, printed on the finest paper, handsomely and durably bound. Following is a brief description of what each book contains:

Book No. 20 shows sixty-two beautiful edges and insertions, both narrow and wide, for every conceivable use, also some handsome crocheted tumbler doilies and medallions. All are illustrated by large photographs, with full directions.

Book No. 21 contains fifty-seven pretty designs in edges and insertions, entirely different from those shown in Book No. 20, all fully illustrated, with full directions. Many of the illustrations show towel, handkerchief and napkin corners complete and there is also a complete alphabet, and an all-crochet plate doily that is simply lovely.

Book No. 22 presents fifty-two new designs in Filet crochet, illustrated, with directions. In this book you will find handsome edges, corners and insertions that you never saw before, alphabets, finished towels, luncheon cloths and napkins, sheets and pillow-cases, dining-room sets, tidies, curtain edges and corners.

Book No. 23 contains seventeen alphabets in various styles and sizes for cross stitch and filet crochet, also wreaths, corners and medallions where the letters are used. Illustrations are all full-page size and very easy to follow.

Book No. 24 contains fifteen artistic yokes shown in large photographic illustrations, with complete instructions. Filet patterns, small medallion schemes, and in braid for round, square, pointed, corset-covers, camisole, night-gown and children's yokes.

Book No. 25 tells how to make knitted and crocheted ripple sweaters and jackets with and without sleeves. Thirteen different styles to choose from and every one a beauty. The stitches are shown in full-page photographs, with full instructions, while the finished articles are also shown by photographs on living models.

Book No. 26 shows thirteen lovely new yokes in filet and fancy crochet with complete instructions and photographic illustrations over one-half actual size. The patterns consist of clover, medallions, filet, knot-stitch, pin-wheel, poinsettia, scalloped filet, and there is also shown one of the new shapes in a filet collar.

Book No. 27 illustrates and tells how to make twelve elaborate medallion arrangements in camisoles and yokes. A feature of this book is the two-page photograph of a beautiful Brassiere or dress trimming. The motifs for yokes include a pretty squared daisy, snowflake, round knot-stitch, pin-wheel, leaf and cross, pineapple, poinsettia, star flower, sunflower, square knot-stitch and round daisy.

Book No. 28 shows how to make filet sweaters, illustrating fourteen handsome designs on living models. These are to be crocheted in dainty light colors for summer wear. Every motif is also pictured by diagram, thus making it very easy to follow the printed instructions.

Book No. 29 contains photographic illustrations and descriptions of tatted yokes and camisoles—fifteen lovely arrangements of medallions in different handsome patterns of pointed, rounded and camisole styles. The illustrations are over half actual size and the directions are full and complete.

Book No. 30 shows seventy-two patterns in edges and corners and insertions. Edges are in all widths—from one half to two inches—and include such novelty designs as "Kiddies' Jumping Rope" and "Little Maids in a Row." Many lovely designs in corners are shown in Torchon, square medallions, knot-stitch and lacet stitch. All are illustrated with half-size photographs with full directions.

Book No. 31 is a book of "spiders," showing this antique design in all its many variations in yokes, corners, edges and insertions. In all, there are twenty-eight different photographic illustrations with directions—six different spider yokes, sixteen different spiders and six ways of turning the corner with a spider.

Book No. 32 contains fourteen filet crochet sweaters, in light and heavy threads, every style shown by photographs on a living model, both front and back views. Every stitch is also plainly shown by photograph and the different motifs are pictured on diagrams with complete directions. Pond lily, wild rose, iris, spray and poinsettia are among the designs shown for long or short, sleeve or sleeveless, belted or unbelted and open front models in cream pink, light pink, blue, light blue, cherry, red, dark green and lavender. The handsomest sweater book ever published.

Stylish Bead Necklace

Jade, Coral, Amber, Blue and Red

For a Club Of Two

THE great popularity of these new style necklaces leads us to make this offer to our women and girl readers. In fact, there seems to be a veritable CRAZE for these beautiful, large, odd-shaped beads, which come in different colors to match the costume, and of generous length, so that they hang well down the front of the dress. They are not strung on string or wire but are fastened together with tiny, glittering, silver-colored rings, which form a pleasing contrast with the rich, subdued colors of the beads themselves. Some of these necklaces—which, by the way, retail as high as $5.00—are enormous in size, others are quite small; we picked out a medium size, thinking it would please the greater number of our readers. It is 30 inches long, two of the beads are larger than the rest, as shown in the illustration, while at the very end and serving as a pendant, there hangs a large, handsome, oblong-shaped bead an inch and a quarter long. The smaller beads in this necklace are each five eighths of an inch long and there are forty-two beads in all.

We will send you one of these handsome and stylish necklaces—your choice of red, blue, amber, coral and jade—upon the terms of the following offer.

Given To You! For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will send you this Necklace free by parcel post, prepaid. Please be sure to mention color wanted. Premium No. 9232.

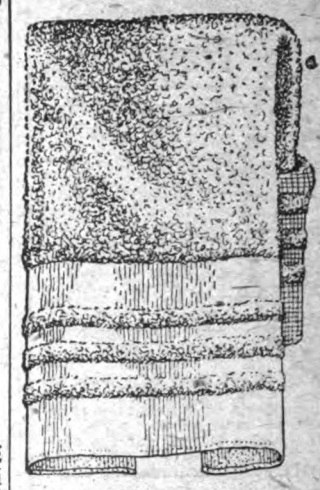
We Give You The Bag-Top —You Make The Bag!

Use Moire Silk Or Velvet

THESE pretty home-made bags are all the go now. Their great popularity is due to the fact that as each woman makes her own bag it is sure to be distinctive—a little different from other women's bags. It is very easy to make and inexpensive. You probably have the material on hand right now—odds and ends of silk, velvet or moire, whatever you decide to use. The tassel on the bottom is not necessary but you can easily afford to buy one as they cost only a few cents. Or you can make it yourself.



The bag-top offered you here is seven inches wide, made of handsome oxidized metal with a very deeply embossed floral design. It is the "gate-top" style—that is, each side opens out in the middle so that it really has four sides as shown in the illustration. It is also perforated along the edge with small holes to take the stitches necessary for attaching the bag. The chain is fourteen inches long.

Our Free Offer. For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will send you this handsome and stylish Bag-Top free by parcel post, prepaid. Premium No. 9692.

Genuine Gold Filled

Guaranteed For 5 Years

Gold Birthstone Rings

THE most popular ladies' rings worn today are these beautiful birthstone rings. Not only is it considered lucky to wear one of them but they are now and always will be exceedingly stylish. We are able to illustrate only three of the rings but there are twelve in all—a different stone for each month of the year, and of course you should wear the stone that is symbolical of the month you were born. The following is a list of the twelve rings, names of the stones and the month to which they apply:

No. 8411, January, Garnet. No. 8421, February, Amethyst. No. 8431, March, Bloodstone. No. 8441, April, Diamond. No. 8451, May, Emerald. No. 8461, June, Agate. No. 8471, July, Ruby. No. 8481, August, Sardonyx. No. 8491, September, Sapphire. No. 8501, October, Opal. No. 8511, November, Topaz. No. 8521, December, Turquoise.

Each ring is guaranteed genuine gold filled, which looks exactly like solid gold and will wear for years. In fact we absolutely guarantee each ring for at least five years. The rings themselves are perfectly plain, the stones are solitaires and perfect imitations of the real gems. The setting of each ring is the ever popular "Tiffany" style. As a Christmas, Birthday or all-the-year-round gift for wife, mother, sweetheart or sister, nothing could be more appropriate and acceptable than one of these beautiful guaranteed rings set with the birthstone of the person to whom it is given. We will send you one of these rings free upon the terms of the following offer:

Given To You! For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents we will send you one of these beautiful gold-filled Rings by parcel post, prepaid. Please be sure to give size and number of ring wanted.

Make This Pretty LINGERIE SET

We Will Give You The Transfer Patterns

WITH the aid of our new transfer patterns any woman may easily make this attractive set, consisting of night robe, corset cover and boudoir cap. You can use your own choice of material: we would recommend nainsook, cambric, lawn or wash silk. The handsome designs, which are so well shown in our illustration, may be worked in either all white, or light shades of blue or pink, or in both white and colors, as desired. The embroidery for all three pieces may consist of French knots, satin stitch or eyelets: we would suggest French knots as being the most effective. The scalloped edges are of course worked in buttonhole stitch.

Our Special Offer. For only one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents, we will send you the three transfer patterns for this handsome Lingerie Set free by mail postpaid. Premium No. 8331.

Full Nickel Plated Alarm Clock

Premium No. 7555

FOR A CLUB OF FIVE

HERE is an Alarm Clock that you can depend upon—a clock that will keep good time all the time and having a patent shut-off alarm which will never fail to ring when you want it to ring. It is not a cheap imported clock but is made right here in this country by the Western Clock Co., of Illinois, the same company which manufactures the famous "Big Ben" which is advertised and sold throughout the entire civilized world. This clock stands over 6 inches high, full nickel plated, and has a 4-inch dial with large Arabic numerals. It will run twenty-four hours on one winding. The movement is the best American made, including frictionless pivots, self-centered wheels and hard steel pallet escapement. It is a clock which we can heartily recommend, in fact, we would not offer it as a premium if we were not positive that it will give the best of satisfaction. You can have one of these guaranteed Alarm Clocks, and it will not cost you one cent, by accepting the following special Club Offer. For a club of only five one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you this Alarm Clock exactly as described, free by parcel post, prepaid. Premium No. 7555.

Gate Top Mesh Purse

THIS is the new "Gate Top" mesh purse with a ten-inch wrist chain, handsome, stylish, and perfectly safe for the carrying of money and other valuables. A slight pull with the forefinger of each hand instantly opens the purse, a gentle pressure with thumb and finger closes it. Our illustration shows the purse closed. When open the top is as large as the bottom, or in other words, two inches in diameter. When closed it leaves an opening only three-fourths of an inch wide over which the brightly polished German silver cover snaps down tightly so that the contents of the purse cannot possibly become lost. This dainty purse is now extremely fashionable so we have purchased a quantity for the benefit of those of our lady and girl readers who like to be up-to-date in these little accessories. You can have one of them free by taking advantage of the following

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not related to the special departments elsewhere in the paper will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

L. F., Franklinton, La.—Mississippi contains but 39,933 acres of vacant public land. W. F. Cummins is Register of the one U. S. Land Office in the state, which is at Jackson.

MRS. E. B., Spring Hill, Tenn.—Write to the Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., and ask for the bulletin the department publishes on the subject of cold pack canning.

H. J., Clovis, N. M.—The matter of being a "movie star" is not so easy as you think. Even to act a minor part in a film drama requires a certain amount of dramatic training and talent. There is also the need of having features which will "register" well. All large moving picture studios are constantly using "extras" in productions requiring scenes containing crowds, mobs, etc. A beginner might secure employment as one of these supernumeraries and in this way find out how well he or she was suited to the game. A North Dakota reader of COMFORT, who wrote to the Fox Film Company, received the following reply: "There is always a great crowd waiting at our employment window and I could not give you any encouragement now. But if you have some money, it is best for you to go to some studio and stay there. Then perhaps while the director is picking his cast, and you happen to be his type, you may get in as an extra. If you happen to prove satisfactory in your first appearance they may engage you again. But chances are poor." (2) As has often been said, the only way to have friends is to be one. This means to throw aside self-love and self-will and strive to aid others. If you will do this you will soon have friends in abundance.

H. W., Alderson, W. Va.—The inscription on your violin is meant to convey the belief that the instrument was made in Cremona, Italy, in the year 1634. We wish it might be true that you were the owner of a genuine Amati violin, but we feel very sure that your instrument is but one of the falsely branded "old violins," concerning which we have so often written in this department in answer to COMFORT readers who believe they possess instruments which are the work of the old master violin builders.

Arthur Stahl, Woodstock Valley, Conn.—We do not believe that any firm or individual is in the market for live skunks. There are, however, so-called "skunk farms" where these famous and most undomestic animals are bred for the sake of their pelts.

MRS. J. S., Congo, Ark.—The physics laboratory of any modern high school should be able to pass upon the variety and value of the piece of mineral you have found.

E. E., Peabody, Kan.—All manuscripts submitted for editorial examination should be typed double spaced on paper preferably of usual typewriter size. The author's name and address should appear at the head of the manuscript which should be sent flat and not rolled. Sufficient postage must be enclosed to cover the return trip which is most likely to occur. There is no ruling which would prevent you submitting the work of your pen—in the form above stated—to any of the editors of the hundreds of periodicals with which you are probably familiar or can find in the reading rooms of any library.

MRS. G. C. B., Lucy, New Mex.—Read answer to E. E., Peabody, Kan., which appears in this column.

S. H., Erie, Pa.—Turpentine is a natural resinous product of the pine tree, although it passes through a refining process before reaching the consumer. It has a distinct place in medical practice and is of value in colds and diseases of the respiratory tract. (2) Why some plants are poisonous and others are not is one of Dame Nature's mysteries,—of which there are many. Side by side may grow in your garden the red beet, the yellow turnip and the white parsnip, all differing in color and flavor, and in the same manner the ppison oak and deadly nightshade may grow nearby the healing witch-hazel.

A READER OF COMFORT, Callao, Mo.—New Mexico has 14,033,148 acres of surveyed public lands awaiting settlement. There are six U. S. land offices in the state. The largest of these would be at Sante Fe, where F. Delgado is Register. Arizona's unappropriated lands contain 7,142,565 acres. John L. Ervin is Register of the U. S. land office at Phoenix—the only one maintained in the state. Colorado has an open offering of 8,251,287 acres, and the state has no less than ten U. S. land offices. The most important of these would be at Denver, where Mrs. M. Dargin is Register, and Leadville, where the office is in charge of E. J. Hoefnagels.

L. A., Irving, Ill.—You can produce larger roses by intensive fertilizing of the soil in which your bushes grow, and by the pruning of your bush to one or two main shoots containing but a few buds. (2) The Japanese gardeners have made a study of the production of the miniature trees so popular with them. These results are obtained by a continual pinching back and pruning of the branches.

I. M. E., Spring Hill, W. Va.—There are only 30,129 acres of vacant public land in Louisiana and but one U. S. land office in the state. This is at Baton Rouge, where you should address E. D. Giannelloni, the Register of this office.

F. N. H., Ocala, Texas.—According to last reports, Evelyn Nesbit Thaw was following the career of an actress in moving picture productions. (2) You need not fear that any metal buried beneath the earth will attract lightning. (3) Mark Twain, Charles Dickens, and many other writers whose names are household words, received no university education and even very little schooling. Both the wisdom taught by life and that contained between the covers of books is open to all of us who may choose to observe and study. Schools and colleges but establish modes for systematic learning of knowledge which most often has come into the world from those who knew no systems or college halls.

J. B., Taylor's Mills, Miss.—To sell the game you have invented to any advantage you should first have it patented. It would then be possible for you to submit samples of your cardboard invention to those who might be interested in putting such a game before the public—if it is as interesting a production as you claim it to be.

I. L. D., Louise, Texas.—We do not think you had best attempt the repairing of this violin at home, but should place it in the hands of some maker who can restore it to usefulness.

The Valley of Right

"Somewhere, in the dim distant future,
There's a mystical valley of light,
Where rippling rivers of sunshine
Flow silent and ceaseless and bright;
Where beautiful flowers bloom eternal,
Where day never sinks into night;
Where the sad, careworn and weary,
Shall rest in the Valley of Right.

"Far over the mountains of anguish,
And the deep sullen seas of care,
Far away from the earth and its weeping,
There's a beautiful valley—somewhere.
Far out in the fathomless future,
Beyond earth's dark, dismal night,
The soul shall come out of the shadows
In the beautiful Valley of Right.

"Somewhere, by a hand soft and loving,
The tears shall be wiped from our eyes,
And the shadows that gather around us
Will silently, surely arise;
And the hope of the soul, long imprisoned,
Shall be granted, eternal and bright,
For joy shall crown it immortal
In the beautiful Valley of Right.

"Somewhere our hopes shall be real,
Our day-dreams and heart-yearnings cease;
Somewhere, when we cross the cold river,
We shall enter the Valley of Peace;
Somewhere, tho' our eyes are now blinded
And the vision is far out of sight,
We shall see the wonderful valley
This faraway Valley of Right.

"Oh! many have searched the world over
To find this valley so sweet;
But its faraway evergreen shores
Never echo to earth-treading feet;
And all who hope for an entrance
To this beautiful home of delight
Must cross the stream at the straight-gate
And go through the Valley of Right.

"There the wrongs of life will be righted,
And friend will meet friend 'on the square,'
And in the pure sunlight of justice
We shall know and be known as we are;
And the mysteries of earth that so vexed us
Will there be made plain to our sight,
For God will be there—it is Heaven,
This beautiful Valley of Right."

The Country Boy's Advantages

By Armstrong Perry.

A "BOY WANTED" ad. in a daily paper in a large city sometimes brings to a store, factory or office a hundred or more applicants.

A rural youth was once surprised by being picked out of a crowd of job seekers and brought into the presence of "the boss."

"You are from the country, are you not?"

The question embarrassed the country lad, because the joke-books had made him feel that being from the country is somehow a joke, if not a disgrace, in the eyes of the city man. However, he was "caught with the goods" and confessed that he was—in fact, that he came right off the farm.

"I thought so—that's why I want you," said the boss, and before the farmer boy had recovered from his surprise he found himself started in a job which eventually led to genuine success.

In the first year he found out why the employer wanted country boys. He found out by watching the employees who came and went in the establishment. The employer needed boys and men who could tell the truth whether it appeared to be to their advantage or not. He needed employees who were not "color blind," but could tell the difference between their own money and the firm's.

He needed workers who worked, whether they were watched or not, and who were not afraid to stay on the job an hour longer when the hour meant a lot to the house.

From long experience he had found that he could rely upon a country boy more safely than upon a city boy. Some city boys were honest and industrious and some country boys disappointed him, but the average of good employees was higher among those who had grown up in the country.

The employer explained it by saying that the country boy was used to getting up early because he had chores to do before school. He was satisfied to work later because he was used to doing some more chores after the main part of the day's work was done.

His pay seemed larger because he knew how to make a dollar go farther. The opportunities appeared larger because he compared them with what the jobs offered in country stores and village offices. And he was truthful and honest as a matter of habit.

And another thing, the country boy would go to night school and prepare himself for bigger positions, while the city boy was squandering time and money on the streets and in cheap theatres.

One thing the boss said he could not understand and that was why country boys left the country. He said the production of food was the biggest game in the world and the most profitable if a man mixed brains with his labor. Practically all of the successful men he knew, he said, were planning to go back to the country some time and live on farms. Why didn't they stay there and make their success there in the first place?

Any country boy could answer him. It is because of the loneliness of the country. The country boy reads of the great sights of the city, the great men there and the great opportunities there, until everything in the country seems small by comparison. He wants to see and do greater things; to be associated with the big men in their big enterprises.

And any country boy over twelve years of age can do that, beginning right now. He can join an organization with over half a million members, among them scores of men prominent in business, professions and in high official positions. He can work with them and make a name for himself without leaving home. When he does go to visit the city he can find brother members everywhere who will welcome him.

Three Beautiful PEONIES

WHITE - PINK - RED

GORGEOUS, yearly-blooming Peonies—the rival of the finest roses in size, form and color. The three varieties offered you here require but little care and attention after once being planted; they thrive anywhere, even in the coldest climates, and produce more and more flowers every season. We will send you the roots, packed in damp moss, direct from the greenhouse. You can put them in the ground at once and next summer you will know the pleasure and satisfaction of having a beautiful garden of peonies in the most glorious shades of white, pink and red. The three different varieties sent you free on this offer include

Couronne d'Or A white, semi-rose Peony that blooms in early summer, bearing immense, very full, imbricated, ball-shaped blossoms which are very solid and compactly built from edge to center. Their color is a snow-white, reflecting golden-yellow stamens that show through the petals when looking at the flower from the side. These stamens light up the whole flower with a glow that is simply indescribable and which suggests its name, "Crown of Gold." Delicate carmine pencilings also appear on the edges of a few central petals. This variety is incomparably lovely and one of the best and choicest Peonies in culture.

Mademoiselle Desbuissons A pink semi-rose Peony that blooms in mid-season. Its flowers are very large, full and elegantly shaped, imbricated and flat with extra large petals of a tender, glossy pink color. The center is a delicate waxy white, the guards a handsome violet-rose color. Flower lovers pronounce this one of the most beautiful varieties.

L'Ecletante A red Bomb type Peony that blooms well into the summer. Its blossoms are very double and full. The color is a deep, brilliant, velvety-crimson. This variety makes a stately and handsome plant, every flower standing up straight and erect, well above the foliage. It is considered as one of the finest red Peonies ever grown.

The roots of these plants are all extra strong and each one contains from two to five eyes. We guarantee that they will reach you in a healthy-growing condition, ready to be placed in the ground and that they will positively bloom next season. If for any reason they do not—or if they should otherwise prove unsatisfactory—we will replace them for you free of all cost.

As the best season for planting Peonies is right now, you should send in your order at once. We will send you these three above described varieties—one white, one pink and one red—free upon the terms of the following special

CLUB OFFER! For three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you the healthy, well-formed roots of the three beautiful varieties of Peonies described above, free by parcel post, prepaid. They will be mailed, carefully packed, direct from the greenhouse, and delivered to you in perfect condition, all ready for planting. Premium No. 8983.

SELF-FILLING Fountain Pen

For A Club Of Three

HERE is a fountain pen that we can positively guarantee. Perhaps you have had some experience with fountain pens which never would write well and continually leaked ink all over your fingers. If so you will certainly appreciate this opportunity to secure a fountain pen that has none of these defects. Our illustration is of course greatly reduced in size. The pen offered you here is 6½ inches long, made entirely of hard rubber, finely finished, and the pen point is genuine 14-K gold. The feeding device is perfect, permitting a uniform flow of ink and it will not leak. Also please notice that this is a self-filling pen. You can fill this fountain pen in less than 10 seconds by pressing down the spring on the side, then placing the pen point in a bottle of ink, after which you release the spring and the pen is instantly filled with ink to its full capacity. If given proper care this pen should last anybody for years. If you will accept the following special offer we will send you one of these self-filling fountain pens with a positive guarantee that if it fails to prove satisfactory in any way you may return it to us and we will replace it with a new pen free of charge.

Handsome Stamped Pillow-Top

With Back and Fringe

A DESIGN that will appeal to all lovers of home. A comfortable, old-fashioned farmhouse, the well with the "old oaken bucket," and a cluster of handsome American Beauty roses. The stamping is done in natural colors on tan art crash, 17x21 inches, these colors acting as a guide to the embroiderer. Or, if desired, the whole design may be simply outlined in black. If embroidered, the roses should be worked in red and pink, using the outline stitch for all but the light part, which should be worked solid. The leaves are to be outlined in green, the stems in brown. Work the house, well and surroundings in outline in colors corresponding to those stamped. The words "Home Sweet Home" are to be done in black in solid embroidery and outline stitch. We will send you this handsome stamped pillow-top with back and fringe upon the terms of the following offer:

Given To You! For two one year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents we will send you this Pillow Top with back and fringe free by parcel post, prepaid. Premium No. 9242.

Six Silver Teaspoons

The Beautiful "Morning Glory" Design

BY buying in large quantities we are enabled to offer our readers this handsome set of six teaspoons for the ridiculously small club mentioned below. They are six inches long, silver plated on a white metal base, so there is no brass to show through, and they will never have that dingy or tarnished appearance even after years of constant use. The design is the beautiful "Morning Glory" deeply embossed on the handles which are finished in soft, elegant French grey. The bowls of the spoons are perfectly smooth and bright polished.

The rich design and splendid wearing qualities of these teaspoons combine to make this the most attractive premium offer in years. Our illustration does not do them justice. They must be seen to be appreciated. We know they will exceed your highest expectations.

Given To You! For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will send you six of these fine Silver Plated Teaspoons free by parcel post, prepaid. Premium No. 9682.

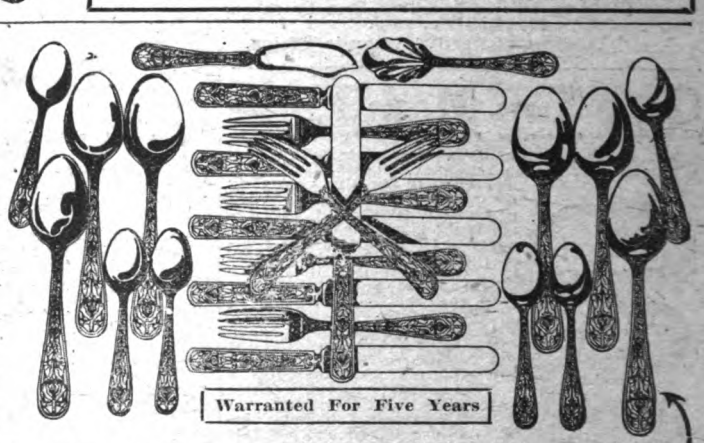
You Will Laugh, You Will Yell, You Will Scream at "The Blunders of A Bashful Man"

Premium No. 8221



You need this great book! You cannot do without it! For chasing away melancholia, dissipating gloom and banishing trouble you will find it better than all the doctors' "dope" in the world and it has the circus and vaudeville beaten a mile. This great story is the world's champion funny book and you must read it because it eradicates wrinkles, improves the complexion and by its laughter-compelling mirth and irresistible humor rejuvenates your whole body. In this screamingly funny story you follow with rapt attention and hilarious delight the mishaps, mortifications, confusions and agonizing mental and physical distresses of a self-conscious, hypersensitive, appallingly bashful young man who stumbles on through a succession of astounding accidents and ludicrous predicaments that will convulse you with cyclonic laughter causing you to hold both sides for fear of exploding from an excess of uproarious merriment. As a fun maker, rib tickler and laugh-provoker this great story "The Blunders of a Bashful Man" beats all records and you will miss the treat of your life if you don't get it and read it at once.

Given To You For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you a copy of "The Blunders of a Bashful Man" free and prepaid. Premium No. 8221.

26-Piece Table Set

Yours Prepaid For A Club Of Seven

WE have in the past made many offers of table-ware, but this is the first time we have been able to offer a complete set of 26 Pieces in return for so small a club. And please don't think that because we are giving this set on liberal terms that it is plated on a brass base and consequently will change color and have that "brassy" look just as soon as the plating wears off. On the contrary, it has a white metal base; therefore each and every piece is the same color all the way through and will not show signs of wear, even after years of constant use. As shown in the above illustration, there are 26 pieces in this set—6 Knives, 6 Forks, 6 Teaspoons, 6 Tablespoons, Sugar Shell and Butter Knife. Each piece is full regulation size for family use, the handles are handsomely embossed and the blades of the knives and the bowls of the teaspoons and tablespoons are perfectly plain and bright polished. It is only because we buy this set in large quantities direct from the factory that we are able to secure it at a price that enables us to offer it as a premium for so few subscriptions. It is by far the greatest value we have offered and we guarantee every Set sent out for a period of five years. We will send this 26-Piece Table Set exactly as illustrated and described to any address upon the terms of the following special

Club Offer. For a club of seven one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you this 26-Piece Table Set free by parcel post, prepaid. Premium No. 7397.

Shaggy Teddy Bear

EVERY little boy and girl wants a Teddy Bear and here is an opportunity for every father or mother who reads COMFORT to get one without expense. "Teddy" is a plump, shaggy fellow, 10 inches tall, made of brown plush, carefully stitched and finished, and his head and legs are jointed in such a manner that you can place him in almost any position. He will stand up, sit down, stand on his head, walk on all fours, in fact he gets himself into all kinds of positions, so comical and lifelike that it makes the children scream with delight just to look at him. Teddy is so well made that he cannot easily become broken, and with ordinary care should last for years. We will send you Teddy free if you will accept the following special offer:

SCRIM CURTAINS GIVEN!

THE price of cloth has advanced tremendously within the past few years, but that does not prevent us from offering these stylish Scrim Curtains for the ridiculous small club of six. We make no money profit on our premiums — that's the reason. They are full size, each side piece measuring 2½ feet in width and just long enough so they will hang a little below the window sill. The top piece or "valance," as it is commonly called, is 1 1-6 feet wide and 2½ feet long. The insertion is a 3-inch band of Filet lace. The color is White or Ecru—whichever you prefer. These Curtains are all the style now, so don't miss this wonderful opportunity to secure one or more of them absolutely free. And be sure to send in your order at once as our supply is limited.

Given To You. For a club of only six one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you these stylish Curtains free by parcel post prepaid. Be sure to mention color wanted. Premium No. 7756.

feel that I ought to be with her and make, or try to, her last days as pleasant as I can. Now he says it is selfish of me not to want to go, that I don't want to go because all of my people are here. Is it? I want to do the right thing but what is right? He is as good to me as can be. Everyone says he is the best man about helping his wife they ever saw. So you see it is hard for me to say no to him.

So far as money trouble is concerned, it's just like some of the others. He holds the pocketbook—but gives me money when I ask for it.

Please tell me what to do.

YOUR WORRIED SISTER.

MISSOURI.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I live in the country and I want to attend high school next year but my parents cannot pay my way so I am writing to ask some of the sisters who have worked their way through school to write to me. Or if there are any who would let me work for them and go to high school I wish they'd write to me. The nearest high school is thirty-five miles distant and I am not acquainted there so thought I could find a place easier through the Sisters' Corner. I am asking Mrs. Wilkinson not to print my name or address as some of my friends would try to discourage me if they knew of this as they have done on previous occasions.

Hoping to hear from some one who is interested, T.

T.—The principal of the high school nearest you should be able to help you if you write to him and state your case clearly.—Ed.

KENTUCKY.

TAP! TAP!

I hope I hear someone say "Come in." Anyway, I'll try once more, for the fourth time since I appeared as "Troubled Wife." Perhaps if I do not make this too long, dear Mrs. Wilkinson will not throw it away. In my other letters I tried to say a word to each one who answered my plea and explain to each how I felt and how her advice helped me, so that I made my letters too long but now I will say to each one that your advice helped me each in its way; some made me ashamed of myself while others seemed to show me a better way. Pearl Vesey, especially, made me ashamed of my foolishness while another sister, whose name I can't remember, made me feel good by saying if I were foolish, so was she.—Sister, I wanted to hug you.

I took all the advice I got but used common sense and let bygones be bygones and made up my mind I would no longer beg him to love and pet me and while it was a hard row to hoe I finally got it hoed. One sister asked me if I ever talked things over with my husband and explained how I felt? I did many times before I even wrote to COMFORT but the only answer was that I was silly or something like that so I made my mind up a thousand times to quit caring or letting him know I cared and at last I stuck to my resolution and when he missed my baby ways and my notice and the little things he had grown used to, he tried to win them back but I have learned to manage him a little better and we are living contentedly and I have learned to do without that which he doesn't see fit to give. I don't complain so we never have a cross word any more. If he says something cross I laugh at him and do as I please in the end. He finds there really wasn't anything to be cross about. If things don't go right I try to keep still and not ask questions or annoy in any way till he has gotten over whatever displeased him.

Once more I will sign myself "Troubled Wife," but my troubles have floated away like the fog before the beautiful sun.

TROUBLED WIFE.

The Family Doctor

The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be taken to your local doctor.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

MRS. R. C. A., Hillsville, Va.—For the rheumatism, better take five-grain doses of sodium salicylate after meals. Also drink plenty of good spring water.

MR. H. A. C., Muskogee, Okla.—Tapeworm is very difficult to remove. The one best remedy is male fern taken after a prolonged diet, and after the bowels have been thoroughly cleaned out. Of course, the male fern is a potent drug and must be taken only under the advice and care of your local physician.

MRS. R. G. M., Alexandria, La.—We think your diagnosis of your condition is correct. You have worked too hard and had children too often. The only thing for you to do is to take a change or take a vacation. Besides, you might take Basham's mixture in tablespoonful doses after meals, well diluted, as a tonic.

MISS M. McI., Forest Glen, N. S.—It seems, from your symptoms, that a good tonic is what you need as well as a thorough physical examination. Try two-grain quinine pills after meals three times a day for a while.

MISS R. S., Hazelhurst, Miss.—Have half of the ingrowing nail removed surgically, also have the surrounding flesh removed at the same time. Of course, this must be done by a good surgeon.

MRS. W. S. J., Needles, S. Dak.—Indigestion causes the gas after meals. The discharge from the bowels three times a day is all right, but you should regulate your diet so that you will get rid of the indigestion. Better take five-grain tablets of bicarbonate of soda after meals. This remedy will also remedy or help your bladder trouble.

MRS. B. S., Iverson, Minn.—For the excessive urinating, try urotropine, in five-grain doses, after meals.

MRS. N. L. D., Mason City, Ia.—Eczema of the eyelids is, in most cases, due to eye-strain, and the need of glasses is indicated. For the bladder trouble, have the bladder washed out by your family doctor. The best drug to use for the irrigation is a teaspoonful of permanganate of potash in about a quart of water.

MRS. A. W. R., Marlboro, N. H.—Cannot recommend the remedy you mention as safe or reliable. To reduce excess of flesh, you must exercise regularly, avoid sweets of all kinds, drink plenty of water, and, on alternate days, use for food and drink one quart of skimmed milk as follows: One fourth in the morning, one fourth at noon, one fourth at 4 o'clock and the rest at night. On other days, eat only such foods as do not make flesh. This, of course, includes bread and most cereals. Your irregularity also is due to poor circulation due to excessive flesh and resultant lack of exercise.

MRS. L. L., Breys, Mo.—The pain in breast just before menstruation is physiological and needs no treatment.

MRS. K. P., Denver, Colo.—As to the swelling in the limbs and up the back, you had better at once have the urine examined and in this way ascertain whether there is any kidney complication. Of course, you should eat foods that will resist your tendency to constipation. Bran, spinach, lettuce, etc., are indicated along this line. Besides, you must keep your bowels regular. You might try for this some cascara sagrada pills, and add to this with your meals a tablespoonful of American Oil.

MRS. M. P. S., Grand Isle, La.—You had better have your blood examined for some blood disease. You may have a constitutional trouble that causes the feeling of a band around the chest.

MRS. F. N., Pigeon, Mich.—Apply a fly blister to the liver for the yellow color of the skin. A boric acid lotion is good for the "tanning" mentioned. The fly blister should be applied by your family doctor and dressed by him.

"UNHAPPY."—You must give name and address as no answer can be given unless the above conditions are complied with.

MR. B. F., Palestine, Ark.—Squeeze out the pus from the pimples and apply white precipitate to the parts. Strength of ointment should be about eight per cent. Of course, omit from your diet all sweets, including pastry.

MISS Z. H., Rising Star, Texas.—You can get lotio alba at any drug store.

MISS J. K., Lansing, Ill.—Many people have no appetite for breakfast. If your appetite is good the rest of the day, that is all that is required. For a bitter taste in the mouth, rinse the mouth out with Dobell's solution three or four times a day.

MRS. A. R. B., San Antonio, Texas.—For a torpid liver, use compound cathartic pills, one or two at night. Then take a teaspoonful of phosphate of soda before meals. At the same time eat with your salads a good quantity of olive oil.

MISS E. M., Oak Hill, West Va.—Remove the "blackheads" with a comedo extractor, steam the face and apply lotio alba to the face. Of course, avoid candy and sweets of all kinds, and bathe often.

MRS. C. J., Moselle, Miss.—Your mother has varicose ulcers of the leg. Bandage the leg during the day time and take off the bandage at night. The woven elastic bandage is best to use. Also apply zinc ointment to the leg.

MRS. L. A. W., Benevolence, Ga.—You must have some middle ear trouble which causes your deafness, and dizziness as well. Have the ears examined and any source of irritation removed.

MRS. G. K. T., Chickasha, Okla.—Have the seed warts, so-called, removed by using the actual cautery. Any good doctor can do this for you and the result will be more than satisfactory in every way.

MRS. D. N. A., Houston, Texas.—Apply to the large brown spots under the ears a 1-to-500 solution of corrosive sublimate. Of course, you must use this very carefully to avoid scarring.

MISS M. F., Selma, Cal.—The electric needle is the only cure for superfluous hair. It is not dangerous or very painful, but the cure is permanent and it leaves no scar.

MRS. A. C. H., Buffalo, Ky.—There is no cure for the results of infantile paralysis. Massage and an attempt to develop the paralyzed muscles is all that can be done.

Best Way of Doing Things Around The Home

Use bacon rinds for flavoring soups and scalloped dishes.

Moisten fruit stains before washing, with camphor, and they can easily be removed.

Put a cocoanut in the oven and let it warm thoroughly before trying to crack it open.

To clean white enamel, rub it well with common baking soda and then wash with hot soap suds.

Roll raisins in a little melted butter before putting them into cake and they will not go to the bottom.

To clean black silk, wash it in water in which peeled potatoes have been boiled. This adds a fine gloss.

Roast beef to be used cold will be kept moist and tender if wrapped in a clean, damp cloth before putting away.

Adding a few slices off a candle to starch will make ironing easier and do away with sticking.—MRS. S., Boston, Mass.

If soft custard curdles, set it in a pan of cold water and beat it well with an egg beater. This applies to salad dressing as well.

If jelly will not set or harden, put the tumblers into cold water to which has been added two tablespoons each salt and soda.

To have custard pie a nice even brown when baked, sprinkle a little sugar over the top just before putting it into oven.—MISS M. A., Dallas City, Ill.

I always use a teacup, with handle, in filling fruit jars and find it can be done much faster than by dipping with spoon.—FARMER'S BUSY WIFE, Hays, Va.

TO KEEP OUT ANTS.—(Requested.) Dissolve one pound of alum in two quarts of water and let it stand two or three hours. Heat to boiling point and apply to shelves and all places frequented by ants.

Many crocheters do very loose work and it seems as though they are unable to remedy this defect. Let them try winding, say about a yard of thread around the end of first finger, leaving about two inches between the finger and crochet hook; then work in the usual way, unwinding it as crocheting proceeds. This holds the thread as tight as required and I have found it helpful.—MISS IDA BATES, Jackson, S. C.

Remedies

Poisons are of three kinds, corrosive, irritant and nerve.

Corrosive poisons produce instant burning effect on all parts touched by them so there is staining of lips, mouth and burning pain in mouth, throat and stomach; straining and vomiting; also perhaps suffocation and always shock.

Corrosive poisons.—Those which stain and for which an emetic is best not given. Strong acids: Sulphuric (oil of vitriol); hydrochloric (spirits of salt); nitric (aqua fortis). Strong alkalies: Caustic soda, potash and lime.

Treatment.—1: Neutralize poison. 2: Dilute poison and soothe corroded parts. 3: Stimulants.

1.—If acid, to neutralize give alkalies as plaster from ceiling, magnesia, baking soda or even soap. If alkalies, to neutralize give vinegar, lemon or orange juice.

2.—To dilute and soothe for both acids and alkalies give large quantities of oil, any vegetable or animal oil, such as olive, salad, sardine, linseed, castor or cod liver oil; also water, milk, flour and water or eggs beaten up.

3.—Stimulants: Strong tea and coffee, ammonia or alcohol.

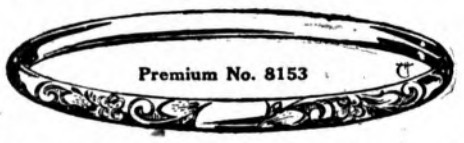
BEADWORK is all the rage again. And here is a wonderful yet simple Bead Loom with which any woman or girl can take up this fascinating work at home and easily make the handsomest bags, chains, necklaces, purses, bracelets, belts, collars and cuffs, dress trimmings, shirtwaist sets, slippers, watch cases, fob chains, card cases, pocketbooks,—in fact there is no limit to the number and variety of exquisitely colored bead work articles that can be woven on this Loom.

Anybody can use the "Kanibas" Bead Loom—it is very easy to understand as everything is fully explained in the instruction book sent with the outfit.

Everything you need to work with is included free with the Loom, so you can begin making the articles at once.

In the outfit you will receive one "Kanibas" Bead Loom, five packages of beads in assorted colors of black, white, blue, green, pink, etc., one dozen special bead needles (very long and slender with an unusually long eye), one large spool of specially prepared waxed bead thread, one gold swivel snap for ladies' or gent's bead watch chain, and a 44-page instruction book containing more than seventy-five photographs and designs of popular bead work, together with easy detailed instructions on just what color of beads to use and how to work them.

This book shows how to make different styles of bags, chains, necklaces, purses, belts, collars and cuffs, shirtwaist sets, slippers, watch cases, fob chains, card cases, pocketbooks, dress trimmings, any letter in the alphabet, any numeral, etc., etc.,—giving full directions for all designs. The popular secret order emblems can be worked with great effect in beads for fob chains, bracelets, card cases, etc., and this book illustrates designs for Masons, Odd Fellows, Knights of Pythias, Knights of Columbus, Elks, Royal Arcanum, also Christian Endeavor, Epworth League and others.



Any woman or girl will be delighted with this practical Loom Outfit because she can make so many pretty things not only for her own use but to give away as presents and to sell. While the beads themselves cost but little, the finished work brings a high price so that there are big profits in the business, if one desires to sell the articles after they are made.

We will give you this Bead Loom and Complete Outfit free upon the terms of the following

Special Club Offer. For six one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you the "Kanibas" Bead Loom and Outfit free by parcel post, prepaid. Premium No. 7746.

UNCLE CHARLIE'S

Poems and Story Book, cloth bound, 60 cents each. Song Book 40 cents. Address UNCLE CHARLIE, care Comfort, Augusta, Maine.

CHROMO, COLO.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I thought I would write you as many other people are writing. I live on a fig farm, and go to a country school. I am in the sixth grade. I went to Phoenix, Arizona, to school all last winter. I had one steer but I shipped him and he weighed a little over eleven hundred and I got one hundred dollars for him. I have three dozen chickens and thirty-four hogs. Well, I don't think I will write any more just now. If Billy the Goat don't see this letter, please try to get it in the COMFORT. If he does get it I hope it won't let his stomach ache.

Your nephew, J. B. CROWLEY.

Glad to hear from you, Jim. So you went to Phoenix to school last winter. That must have been a long walk, Jim, and if you went to and fro each day you must have run Pop up a big bill for shoes. You live in a beautiful, inspiring spot, too inspirng to have anybody hoodoo it with such a name as Chromo. Why not give it some beautiful, soft-sounding, appropriate Indian name such as Saurkrauteville? That would tickle Berger, Borah, Hearst and Johnson all to bits and it is so romantic. You are living in America, while I am living in a combination of Jerusalem, Rome and Cork—mostly Jerusalem—and let me tell you it is far from a holy city. What would I not give for a peep at the dear old United States. Don't any of you come to New York with the idea that you are visiting America or even touching American soil. Uncle Sam bit off more than he could chew when he took New York and its vicinity into his system. New York is too good a name for this dump. It should be called Hyphenville. All the various racial units have their newspapers and are always holding huge meetings and passing various ferocious resolutions that ought to get them the boot. Here is a leading Italian paper talking about "We Italians demand so and so." Then hundreds of meetings are held where gentlemen shriek: "We Irish will vote so and so," and, "We Jews will do something else." They don't even take the trouble to add the hyphen now. Uncle Sam and America are canned as far as this burg is concerned. It is something new to me to know that Jews, Irish, Poles, Italians, Germans, etc., can vote in the United States. I thought that was a privilege reserved solely for Americans. Our foreign boarders are getting entirely too sassy. If Uncle Sam does not put the whole bunch across his knee and throw them out, he will soon be thrown out himself. Jim, I can't understand about the shipping of that steer. There is no possible way that I know of to get a ship up to Chromo, Colo. There is no Panama Canal running in that direction. Of course, you might take him to the edge of the Grand Canyon, push him overboard and let him swim, but he'd be an awful mess when he struck bottom. Doug Fairbanks with Mary's help might get away with a stunt of that kind but no common steer could. You say your steer weighed a little over eleven hundred. Was that pounds or tons? I know they have some whopping big steers in your sections, and I hope he weighed eleven hundred tons, for a few steers of that kind would soon bring down the price of meat. An enterprising New York newspaper has imported a large quantity of lamb from New Zealand and is selling it at cost. But the people won't buy anything but the legs and they believe that a lamb has only two legs located somewhere in the region of its tail. The shoulder-straps in front, which support its noble cranium, they won't touch at any price. Mr. Hillquit and the Bolsheviks might sit down and figure out, when they put that combination of ruin and madness over on us, and everything that you have is thrown into the melting pot for the benefit of loafers and bums, and the dividing-up process begins, just who is to get the prime cuts, the leg, and who will get the wings and the cheap stuff between the neck and the tail. Of course, the Red Guards will get the choice cuts while the rest of us will get cabbage soup and wind doughnuts. The next time you have an eleven-hundred-ton steer, I advise you to put him on a train and not a ship. As far as chickens are concerned, they are aviators and can fly to market. It takes aviation to solve the transportation problem.

ALBION, CALIF.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am in great trouble and want you to help me out. I want to get a sofa pillow from every state in the Union and cannot get the names and addresses of large stores. Can you tell me how I can get them? I am your friend, BERNICE PRICE.

Bernice, you are certainly in terrible trouble. If I were in such a mountain of trouble as you are I think I should have to turn on the gas and do the Dutch act. I do not wish to pry into your private affairs, and it is interest and not curiosity that prompts me to ask what in thunderation you are going to do with some fifty pillows? Now if you wanted fifty bricks and were contemplating building a home, I'd be right with you, or if you wanted four or five pillows for a cozy corner, but in these days when extravagance is a crime and thrift a virtue, when the railroads are congested with cars and there are not enough engines to haul them, and when every article we use is so excessive, why, oh why, get a sudden attack of pillowitis? Remember you cannot go to the stores and select the pillow tops and you can't go running all over the U. S. chasing the poor geese and grabbing their downy overcoats, and if you left it to the managers of all the big stores from Florida to Alaska to select you a pillow, by the time you got them all assembled the color scheme would be so ferocious that you'd want, if you have any artistic sense, to jump out of the window. As so many young ladies paint (now mind I did not say all), the color scheme of your room would have to be red. Then just imagine if you had fifty red pillows all stacked in the corner and an officer of the Department of Justice was to walk in, what would happen? He'd scream "Bolshevik" and you'd be on the way to Ellis Island, New York, by the next train. They'd have to have a special ship to hold the pillows, and when you got to Moscow, imagine the excitement there would be! Brother Trotzky would get out a special edition of the Bolshevik official Soviet paper, "Isvestia," and in big headlines would announce: "YOUNG, AMERICAN BOLSHEVIK BEARING FORTY-EIGHT PILLOWS REPRESENTING EVERY STATE IN THE UNION HAS JOINED THE RED FORCES. Tavarishi (Comrades), greet Bernice! Comrade Bernice will be allowed a quarter section of one pillow, while the balance will be divided among the official autocratic heads of the Russian Soviet Government. We have a soft job, but American pillows will make it softer." Now if you had asked me to get you forty-eight handsome, marriageable boys, they could have sent on their photographs and you could have made your selection. The best pillow in the world is the shoulder of a worth-while, respectable young man. Maybe you have all of that variety of pillow you can do with. They make excellent parlor ornaments but they can seldom be lured into the kitchen at dish-washing time. Bernice, I fear I cannot help you corner the pillow industry. Civilization is tottering. These are days that call for judgment, denial and common sense. I don't want anyone to upset the national boat, not even with a pillow, for a pillow is an awful thing when it gets wet, and shure it's meself that knows it.

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs fifty-five cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The fifty-five cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C.," a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, so after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

How to become a Member

Send fifty-five cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine, with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

League Shut-in and Mercy Work for August

"Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these ye have done it unto Me."

Written references from doctor and postmaster must positively accompany all appeals from shut-ins. Appeals unaccompanied by written references will be destroyed.

Ella Jane Smith, Spencer, Va. Fifteen years of age. Crippled as a result of infantile paralysis. Mother dead. Father can only use left arm. Send this little crippled girl some sympathy and cheer. Well recommended. Mrs. Hattie Durham, Price, R. R. 2, N. C. Husband an invalid, unable to work. Has five children to support. Would be grateful for second-hand clothing and any assistance you care to send. Charles Knece, Laurelville, R. R. 3, Box 62, Ohio. Helpless invalid for eight years. Needy and worthy. Aged father his only support. Send him some of the sympathy that buys bread. Dortha Grigg, Glen Allen, R. R. 1, Box 30, Ala. Invalid for many years. Lovely character. Do not forget her. Noah Felton, Sparta, R. R. 4, Tenn. Thirteen years of age. Helpless cripple from birth. Send him something to cheer his shut-in life. J. W. Bizzell, Newton Grove, N. C. Helpless from rheumatism 22 years. Lovely character. Open your hearts and give him a boost. Mrs. Sweety Witt, Shuff, Va. Invalid. Suffers from heart trouble. Would appreciate second-hand clothing and any financial assistance you can send her. Well recommended. Mrs. Alice Stacey, Dalton, R. R. 3, Ga. Invalid. Fifty-seven years of age. Widow with one son who is helpless and unable to work. She would be grateful for a dime shower, also second-hand clothing. James Wortham, Letona, Ark. Invalid for many years. Send him some cheer.

The poor souls whose names are listed above are in too desperate need to care for anything but substantial financial assistance. Sympathy and cash make a splendid combination but sympathy without cash cuts no icicles. Do to others as you would have them do to you.

Lovingly yours,

Uncle Charlie

3 Wheel Chairs in July

563 is COMFORT'S Total to Date

The three July wheel chairs go to Mrs. Nancy Thurman, R. 3, Everton, Ark., 137; Mrs. Suda Cotnam, King, Ark., 85; Maude Odell Smith, Vernon, Ala., 77. The figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends for them.

Mrs. Nancy Thurman, age 52, was crippled by a fall which caused internal injuries, as a result of which she has been bedridden the past three years. She has no one to wait on her except her husband, who is old and feeble, and her two sons who support the family. The wheel chair will be a blessing to her.

Mrs. Suda Cotnam, age 45 is a widow with four small children. Her left leg is drawn up to a sitting posture, as the result of an abcess, so that she has not been able to walk a step in the past eight years. Nevertheless this wonderfully energetic woman, crippled as she is, manages to support herself and family by keeping boarders. With the help of her children she does the work, getting about in her Comfort wheel chair which she obtained through COMFORT five years ago last May. It has done her good service, but, as she writes, she needs another now and again she gets it through COMFORT.

Maude Odell Smith, age 11, crippled the past six years, as the result of meningitis, so that she cannot walk without assistance. Her Comfort wheel chair will be a source of joy to her and a help to her mother in caring for her.

Doesn't it give you a little thrill of happiness, my good friends, to know that you have helped these unfortunate shut-ins to obtain their much needed wheel chairs?

Remember that there are other cripples on our waiting list who are just as needy of your help to procure wheel chairs. Do what you can for them. Every little helps. Try to get your name in our Roll of Honor next month.

Sincerely yours,

W. M. GANNETT,

Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 150 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 50 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-In and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

Proud of His Comfort Wheel Chair

Fort Skunky, Texas.

Dear Mr. Gannett:

I want to thank you and the many friends who helped in getting the wheel chair for my boy Virgil, and especially Mrs. Alice Pinson who started the good deed. It is certainly a pleasure to the shut-in as well as to those who wait on the cripple. We are all proud of his chair. I will send you his picture later. Wishing you continued success, I remain, (Mrs.) Ida Hudgins.

Thinks Her Comfort Wheel Chair Just Grand

Shawnee, Okla.

Dear Mr. Gannett:

Gladys received her wheel chair in good condition and it certainly is nice. She thinks it is just grand. I wish to thank you and the many kind friends who helped in getting her chair. Gladys will surely enjoy it, and it is such a help to me in caring for her. Thanking you again, I am, Sincerely yours, (Mrs.) M. M. Junk.

COMFORT'S Roll of Honor

The Roll of Honor comprises the names of those who have sent five or more subscriptions, or a dollar or more in money, to credit of the Wheel-Chair Club during the month previous. Following each name is the number of subscriptions sent.

Sixteen Things at Twenty-One

By Carl Schurz Lowden

There are many things every man wishes he had known before he reached twenty-one. The early years lay the foundation for those that come after; each act, habit, and alignment makes or mars.

While I was in my teen-age I would acquire the habit of doing one or more kindnesses between sunrise and sunset.

I would devote fifteen or twenty minutes a day to physical exercise to maintain health and a clear brain.

I would try to realize that my well-being after thirty depends largely on what I put into my stomach during the preceding two decades.

I would read magazines and books that make me think and which develop my intellect.

I would learn how to take care of money and how to save it and thus be ready to seize opportunity at all times.

I would cultivate acquaintance with a few old persons whose wisdom and common sense may be helpful.

I would not underestimate the importance of good clothes, for neat attire is a commercial asset.

I would appreciate the circumstance that by the sweat of my brow I must earn my subsistence.

Somehow I would get the knowledge that it is difficult for a man, twenty-one or older, to change his habits.

I would attain the viewpoint that quality is more needful than quantity and that things worthwhile require time, patience, and sustained effort.

I would realize to the full the happiness of the Golden Rule and the joy of serving a fellow man.

Like Abraham Lincoln, I would place the highest value on absolute truthfulness.

I would know that honesty is the best policy in dealing with myself, my neighbor, and God.

I would believe that wild oats, once sown, may ruin my career just as a multitude of thistles spoil a pasture otherwise good.

I would align myself with the forces of right and oppose those of evil, ever eschewing liquor, tobacco, infidelity, and immorality.

I would perceive that a thorough education brings the best of everything in life, enjoyable work, better food, wise pleasures, fine friendships, and self-respect.

Only Twenty Years Ago

Nobody swatted the fly.
Nobody wore a wrist watch.
Nobody wore white shoes.
Most young men had "livery bills."
Farmers came to town for their mail.
The heavens were not full of manbirds.
Nor the seas alive with underwater boats.
The hired girl drew one-fifty a week and was happy.
The butcher "threw in" a chunk of liver.
The merchant "threw in" a pair of suspenders with every suit.
Nobody "listened in" on the telephone.
There were no sane Fourths nor electric meters.
Straw stacks were burned instead of baled.
Publishing a country newspaper was not a business—it was a dueling game.
There were no Bolshevists or international anarchists.
The safety razor had not introduced the clean-shaven face.—Ladies' Home Journal.

Poor but Honest

The other day a well-known congressman was exhibiting to his friends a letter that he considers a prize piece. It was from a constituent who had just received a package of free seeds. The congressman had sent them out in a franked envelope on which was stamped the usual words: Penalty for Private Use—$300. The note read:

"DEAR SIR:

"I don't know what to do about those garden seeds you sent me. I notice it is three hundred dollars fine for private use. I don't want to use them for the public; I want to plant them in my own private garden.

"I will be greatly obliged if you will kindly fix matters so I can use them privately. Yours respectfully,

The Sharp Drop in Prices of Clothing, Dress-Goods and Shoes Comes Opportunely for Fall Shopping

AS great a contrariety of opinion as there was regarding the identity of the person "who killed cock robin" appears to exist as to the cause or causes that brought about the decline in the prices of clothing, dress-goods and shoes that has been in progress all summer. Interesting as is the discussion of the causes the happy result that men's and women's clothing can be had at much reduced prices this fall is still more interesting to the public as well as most heartily welcome.

It was predicted and confidently expected that shortly following the armistice prices would start on a downward course and pursue it steadily, even though gradually, until pre-war levels should be reached or approximated in due time. On the contrary war prices not only long outlasted the war but with no apparent reason therefor continued to rise apace even until late last spring. In the absence of a rational explanation of such an anomaly popular judgment denounced profiteering as the cause. And this judgment has been in a measure supported by the disclosures brought to light by Government investigations and prosecutions of certain proven profiteers, which show that profiteering, if not the sole cause, has been a factor in the raising of prices during, and especially since, the war.

But certain well-informed authorities, including the experts of the U. S. Treasury Department, warned that the people, and particularly those whose war-time earnings had risen by leaps and bounds, were much to blame in that their indulgence in previously unaccustomed extravagance tended to raise prices and offered the opportunity for and encouraged profiteering. This preachment after a while got under their skins to the extent that last spring and early summer the people rose en masse determined to put a stop to profiteering in clothes at least, and their purpose found expression through the "old clothes movement" and the formation of "overalls clubs. "Like a pendulum public opinion and action swung from one extreme to the other for the time being. Undoubtedly this threatening attitude of the public, in connection with other causes, had an influence in bringing about the present reduction in prices of clothing and shoes to figures that are low compared with those of last spring and in some cases below the cost of manufacture.

And this gives rise to another difference of opinion. Some express the belief that the downward grade will continue until prices approximate pre-war levels, while others assert that present stocks are selling at a sacrifice because dealers are overloaded and under necessity of turning goods into cash to pay their bills, and that when exhausted the new goods that will take their places on the shelves will have to sell at higher prices to yield a living profit and cover cost of production and transportation at present scales of wages and higher freight rates soon to go into effect; also that, because of so many factories being closed or operating on short hours or with a reduced number of hands there will be a shortage of goods which naturally will tend to higher prices.

We do not pretend to judge the situation or to predict otherwise than to point out that clothing and shoes are necessaries that must be had, must be replenished in the near future at all events, and to suggest that it seems to be the part of thrift and prudence to do your fall and winter shopping early while you can buy at the present cut prices rather than take the chance of higher prices later in the season or even having to go without because of a possible shortage. And this applies to other lines than clothing and shoes, for there is a present shortage in nearly every line of manufactured product. There is a shortage of coal for manufacturing purposes, and transportation facilities are inadequate and uncertain. So if there is anything that you will need this fall or coming winter it appears to be advisable to buy or order now.

Railroad Workers Get Six Hundred Million Dollars Raise of Wages

EVERYBODY in this country has a personal interest in the wage increase amounting to six hundred and twenty-five million dollars a year granted the trainmen and other workers in the employ of the railroads by the award of the Railroad Labor Board in July, because this sum will have to come out of the pockets of the people and no one can possibly escape contributing his or her share of this large annual tax. In what we say we do not imply any criticism of the Railroad Labor Board's action. We simply state the facts and figures for the information of the people, who have to pay the bills, that they may judge whether or not the complaints and criticisms so freely made by the railroad employees because the full amount of their demands was not allowed are justifiable.

Last March, shortly following the return of the railroads by the Government to the corporations that owned them, the one million eight hundred and fifty thousand railroad employees demanded additional wage increases averaging five hundred and ninety dollars more pay per man and totaling eleven hundred million dollars yearly wage increase. The railroad managers declined the responsibility of considering so large a demand on the ground that any considerable raise of railroad wages would necessitate a corresponding raise of freight rates, and therefore passed the matter up to the Railroad Labor Board created by a recent act of Congress for the purpose of deciding such disputes by arbitration instead of by strikes. The members of the Board, nine in number, were appointed by President Wilson, and after an extended hearing of all parties interested awarded the increase above stated, which is about forty per cent. under the amount claimed.

Because they were not allowed the full amount of the increase demanded the railroad workers bitterly denounced the Board's decision and for a time there were mutterings of a strike, but saner counsels prevailed and after a while all the railroad labor unions, except one which is still undecided, concluded not to strike at this time but to accept the award under protest and to present and push fresh demands for a further raise of wages.

In announcing its award the Railroad Labor Board pointed out that the rights of the public had to be considered as well as the interests of the railroad workers and that the Board had sought to do justice to both. In this connection it should be remembered that the railroad men's wages have been advanced several times in recent years and that under Government control during the war they were very largely increased. Although the freight and passenger rates are already so high as to be burdensome, having been raised under Government management during the war, the railroads as a whole are not earning their operating expenses and have been running behind for the past two years at least. The Government operated the railroads a little over two years at a heavy loss, and according to the report of the U. S. Director General of Railroads the Government has been called upon to provide one billion eight hundred and seventy million dollars to cover the deficit and meet the expenses and obligations incurred by the U. S. Railroad administration, and this in spite of the higher transportation rates.

The U. S. Treasury is, at the present writing, still holding the railroads up, but this financial support ends with the last day of August, 1920, and after that they must sink or swim, survive or perish, as best they can on their own resources. For this reason it has been understood that freight rates would have to be raised before that date to enable the railroads to live and do business without Government aid, and the railroad managers had requested the Interstate Commerce Commission to authorize a raise of transportation rates sufficient to produce necessary revenue to make the railroads self-supporting, including the recent raise of railroad men's wages.

The Interstate Commerce Commission has authorized an increase of transportation rates to the amount of one billion five hundred million dollars a year, six hundred and twenty-five million of this being necessary to cover the recently awarded increase of railroad men's wages. To meet this bill the increases of rates are apportioned as follows: freight rates are increased 40 per cent. in New England, 25 per cent. in the South, 35 per cent. in the West; passenger fares are raised 20 per cent.; Pullman car rates are raised 50 per cent., and milk rates are advanced 20 per cent. These new rates will go into effect not later than September first.

This increase of railroad transportation rates is a tax on the people of this country, which, if equally distributed, amounts to about fifteen dollars a head per year on every man, woman and child, or seventy-five dollars a year on a family of five persons. The biggest part of the income of the railroads is derived from transporting freight, and you can't escape paying your share of the increased freight rates even if you never see a railroad. Practically everything in the market has paid at least one or more freight charges, which, of course, form a part of the cost and are added to the price of the article, if the market will stand it. In other words the consumer pays the freight unless market conditions are such that the producer has to pay it. The middle man never has to stand the freight. First or last he makes the producer or consumer pay it.

Government management exerted a demoralizing influence on the railroads, resulting in increased cost of operation and reduced efficiency, so that the country is suffering from lack of adequate transportation service. Now that the blighting effect of party politics has been lifted from their management by the return of the railroads to private ownership and control it is to be hoped that all the superfluous and inefficient employees will be weeded out. It is charged that under Government management it took ten men to do six men's work. One large railroad has eliminated twelve thousand unnecessary men from its pay-roll since the Government retired from the management. In return for the high transportation rates the people will demand better service and increased efficiency and economy in operating, which would to some extent offset the added expense of the increase of railroad men's wages.

The executive heads of the railroads have formed an association for the purpose of cooperation in devising and promoting more efficient and economical methods of operating, important among which are their plans to relieve the shortage of freight cars and locomotives by moving freight cars at least 30 miles a day instead of the Government's average of only 23.1 in 1919, and to speed up repairs on disabled locomotives and freight cars so to reduce the numbers that are out of commission. The railroad problem is one of the biggest and most pressing that we have to solve, for it involves the health, happiness and prosperity of the entire country and is a large factor in the cost of living.

There are two reasons why the railroads or any other business can not be conducted by the Government so efficiently or economically as by private enterprise: first, because of the taint of politics that pervades the public service and encumbers it with incompetent officials, and, second, because with the U. S. Treasury to draw on to cover losses there is lacking that spur to thrifty and progressive management without which a business dependent on its own resources would fail and soon cease to exist.

Compare Choice—Prices—Terms

We urge you to look everywhere before buying new furniture. Hurry-up purchases usually end in disappointment. For instance, we show one splendid bed bargain here. It is just an example of scores shown in our catalog. We advise against buying it until you have seen all. Picking from a meager selection is often wasteful, whether it's a bed or a rocker, dishes, silverware or merely kitchen utensils. It's the best plan to see a plentiful choice and get exactly what is likely to suit through years of service. Prices can then be compared—as well as terms. We ask only that you send for our book and lay it side by side with all others.

10,000 Furniture Bargains in Our Latest FREE Book!

The page size is unusually large so that all pictures are shown big enough to give a splendid idea of finish and details of design. A great many things, like carpets, linoleums, blankets and comforters, are shown in actual colors. It not merely brings all items of furniture, but also every-day household needs such as wringers, baby cabs, linens—everything from cellar to garret.

You ought to have it, no matter where you finally buy. It will prove an excellent guide to prices. It will suggest many thoughts for making your home more cheerful. It shows good grades of furniture in all ranges of price.

With it comes a credit certificate opening your charge account. There is never any need to ask for terms.

Our Credit Is Exceptional—
Compare These Features Anywhere

Our unusual terms and method of dealing with customers scarcely admits of comparison. Our credit is so entirely different. It never allows embarrassment or disappointment.

We never ask for cash and do not want it. No discount is allowed for cash. Everybody receives the same generous treatment and enjoys all the special features of our wonderful plan.

A remarkable fact is that you actually begin to use your purchases and enjoy them before you even decide on buying.

Famous Free Loan Offer More Than a Free Trial

When you wish to see anything in our Bargain Book, you simply tell us so—just as you would ask us to send the bed shown here. There is no red tape; no bother or trouble of any sort. So we send your selection for a month's Free Loan—not merely to look at, but to use it as if it were all bought and paid for. If it's a stove, build a fire in it; if it's a bed sleep in it.

Then Pay Little By Little. If everything pleases you, spread the cost over the longest time. Pay in small amounts, almost as you please.

If you send things back, no apologies are necessary. No exchange or other arrangements are suggested. We immediately refund your trifling deposit; we also pay you back for all transportation costs and hauling expense. The whole matter is wiped off our books.

PROLOGUE.

THE CYCLONE'S MEMENTO.

A CURIOUS throng had gathered upon the straggling outskirts of a little prairie village. In the section to the right of the highway stood tents, their sides fluttering in the breeze. Occasionally could be heard the roar of a lion, or the trumpeting of an elephant, mingled with the hoarse shouts and calls of the men connected with the circus.

It was not time for the afternoon performance by an hour, and yet sombrero-crowned men, passing a whiskey-bottle from one to another, and men of more fashionable attire, women in calico gowns and sunbonnets, and women with hats of the latest style and gowns of the most fashionable cut, stood side by side, waiting for the ticket-wagon to open its doors.

A few of the side-shows were already open to receive the never-to-be-neglected ten cents, and in a wagon to the left, around which a dense throng had gathered, a man was selling patent medicines, warranted to do everything under the sun, and assisting him was a boy, apparently about thirteen years of age, a handsome little fellow, with great dark eyes, almost too large for beauty, and a tanned face, with straight, Grecian nose, well curved at the nostrils, and a beautiful mouth and chin. He was quick, dexterous, and clever, and the man at the end of the wagon looked at him occasionally with an expression of love and admiration in his clear gray eyes.

Beneath the wagon was a queer-looking animal, which the men of the crowd in front were not long in recognizing as an ordinary Western coyote, but they considered him ordinary no longer when they observed the series of tricks through which he was put, and the grim manner in which he performed them.

If his master was an artist, then so, also, was the wolf, addressed as Nemo by the man and boy in the wagon.

The wagon was always opened as soon as the first guests of the circus began to arrive, but on this occasion, while the performance taking place there was even more entertaining than usual, the attention of the crowd seemed to wander.

An occasional anxious eye was cast upward, just as had been those of the men tightening the ropes of the tents.

A man with a long, scrawny neck and straggling gray hair, with a worn, sun-browned hat pushed back from his wrinkled face, muttered audibly, while his eyes were cast anxiously upward:

"I'm danged ef it don't look like a cyclone t' me. There's the funnel, jist like that'n that riddled the town in '74. 'Peers to me it's a-comin' mighty fast, too."

He was speaking to himself, but those about him heard and followed his weather-eye anxiously. It was not time for the ticket-wagon to open, but the ticket-seller hurried into it, and began to shout hoarsely to the crowd to "walk right this way and purchase tickets for the greatest show on earth."

A few people, bent upon remaining, went forward, purchased their seats, and disappeared within the tent, but more remained outside, gazing half-fearfully upward and awaiting developments.

The huge, black belt across the sky was deepening and widening.

The thunder was rolling louder and longer, while the roars of the lions and the trumpeting of the elephants were growing deafening.

Even the coyote under the patent-medicine wagon growled and licked the sides of his mouth with his long, slender tongue.

Para, the patent-medicine vender, who was also an animal tamer when the "show" had begun, stepped close to the boy and whispered:

"As sure as you live there is a cyclone coming, and it is making directly for us!"

Scarcely had the words been uttered than a heavy roll of thunder was followed by a terrific downpour of tremendous hailstones, swept by a fierce wind, which sent them against the terrified people with a force that almost knocked them from their feet.

The people disappeared as if by magic, and had barely done so when the tents were ripped like strips of ribbons from their fastenings, secure as they had been made.

Animal cages were overturned, while the frightened brutes crouched closely to the ground, trumpeting and bellowing, yet too badly frightened to make an effort to escape.

Great holes were torn in the ground, and such trees as there were within range of the tornado's path were ripped up by the roots and tossed aside as if of too little moment to be worth further consideration.

Para, the man in the wagon, had leaped out, and, seizing the boy by the waist, had lifted him up as he might have done an infant, springing to the side of the road and throwing himself on top of the boy into a trench which the villagers had been digging for draining purposes.

Within fifteen minutes the wind had ceased, and the sun was shining down weakly upon the wreckage that had been wrought, as if half-ashamed of the terrific calamity that had befallen the village while his face had been concealed.

Para arose and shook himself, lifting the boy from the ground.

"Are you hurt?" he inquired anxiously.

"No," the boy answered. "Where is Nemo?"

Para glanced around him.

The tents had mostly disappeared. Some small portions of them were scattered about like spots of trampled snow upon the prairie.

The animal-cages were mostly all flat, with the exception of half-a-dozen that had stood just outside the path of the storm.

Para's wagon had been blown at least a hundred yards from where it had been when he left it, but, singularly enough, had not been overturned, and as he looked he uttered a long exclamation.

"See, Rudolph!" he cried, in a low tone. "The wagon is safe, and there under it is Nemo, licking his chops as if nothing under heaven could disturb his equanimity."

Even before the speech had been finished, Rudolph, the boy, had broken from Para's restraining hand, and had leaped forward with long, athletic strides to where the wagon stood.

As he reached it he paused suddenly, gazing downward in stupid astonishment; then he cried loudly:

"Para—Para! Come here, quick! Did you ever see anything like that in all your life?"

With a quick bound, Para reached his side; then he, too, stopped in amazed bewilderment and gazed downward.

The wolf growled, but settled down as Para spoke to him, crouching at his master's feet.

And what the three gazed upon was as strange a sight as ever mortal eyes could meet under wild and sad circumstances like those. It was a little golden-haired baby girl, lying upon a pillow white as newly-fallen snow, soundly sleeping!

She had been blown directly under the wagon, and the wolf had remained on guard as sentinel.

After that moment of dense, breathless silence, Para raised her, still upon the pillow, and placed her in the wagon gently.

She did not stir. Her baby cheeks were still flushed with sleep, her fluffy, golden curls slightly tossed by the wind.

"How frightened her poor mother will be!" exclaimed Para gently. "She is a lady's child, poor little angel, and so pretty that even the storm had not the heart to injure her. I wonder if it would have been kinder not to have spared you, little one? Life is a hard thing for even the strongest of us."

He sighed slightly, then turned his attention to his late companions.

They were in a sad enough plight to require all the assistance that could be given them, for those that still lived were nearly all more or less injured, some with broken limbs, others bruised and bleeding, while half the animals they possessed were killed.

The other half required immediate attention to prevent another outbreak almost as bad as the hurricane had been; and, recognizing it at once, the men turned their attention to them, and worked determinedly, knowing they would have ample time to consider their own deplorable condition when all the danger had passed.

But as Para and Rudolph worked side by side, a long, dismal wail reached them, and, dropping their work simultaneously, they sprang to the side of their wagon.

The storm's gift was sitting up, both her small hands rubbed into her pretty eyes, while the dainty lips were puckered into a wailing cry.

As she saw them, however, she stopped crying instantly, and smiled, bringing all the little childish dimples about her mouth into play, and calling out in sweet, baby prattle:

"Dahfy is hung'y. Dahfy want mi'k. Dahfy is tired of de choo-choo car."

Man and boy looked at each other in amazement.

"What does she mean by that?" gasped Rudolph.

"I'm afraid it means that we are in for it!" explained Para ruefully; "for a time, anyway. She says she is hungry, and that she is tired of the train, which evidently means that the little lady has been traveling. Now, where is her mother? And what are we to give her to eat? What does a baby like that eat?"

"Mi'k!" announced the child triumphantly.

"Which is baby for milk," translated Para. "But where are we to get any?"

"In the car," cried Rudolph.

Para glanced at him, and then turned sorrowfully, reproachfully toward the railroad track. The car was splintered. There was a moment of silence, then Rudolph exclaimed:

"Everything can't be destroyed. Give me some money. I'll scamper up to the village and see what I can get. All right, Dahfy. I'll get you something to stuff that little empty stomach with in a jiffy."

He took the quarter which Para had produced from his pocket, and was off like a flash.

Para turned to the wolf as if he had been a human being.

"Nemo," he said quietly, "take care of that baby. If you hurt her, you are a dead animal. Baby, play with the—er—doggie until Rudolph comes with your milk. Do not cry now, and you will get it if it is to be had."

Then Para returned to his work among his comrades.

The Santa Fe limited had been blown from the track. Many were killed and many more injured, and as no one came to claim the baby that had been deposited in Para's wagon, they arrived at the conclusion that her parents had been killed, and that no one knew of her existence. They spread the report of her escape far and wide, but no one came to claim her, and the poor little fragments of the circus were ready to move on.

"What shall we do with her?" Para demanded helplessly, while the child sat contentedly, with her small hands buried deeply in the shaggy hair of the wolf's back, occasionally laughing gleefully.

"Let us keep her!" pleaded Rudolph. "There is no one in town able to do so at present. I know we are not, but I am big and strong, and will work for her and take care of her. You shall never be bothered with her. I promise you that. Please, dear Para, give her to me! What right have we to throw away the gift of the storm?"

Para smiled grimly.

"I think we are likely to remember the cyclone for many years to come without this memento, but I don't see what else we can do, unless we knock her in the head, as they do the poor little calves for veal. Oh, yes, you may have her, Rudolph; only I'm sadly afraid I'm hanging a millstone around your neck that will drag you to destruction some day. She's unfortunately possessed of a dower that has ruined many a man's soul—beauty. Keep your memento, my boy, but don't set your heart too closely upon her. Remember there are others, of whom we know nothing now, who may claim her some day, and if that should happen she would be taken out of your life forever. Always remember that she comes of America's nobility—her garments have shown that, and the little embroidered name upon them—while you are only an attache of the circus—nobody in particular—nobody at all!"

CHAPTER I.

AFTER FIFTEEN YEARS.

Fifteen years had elapsed since the day the cyclone visited Buxton's circus with such disastrous results, and yet the circus was still in existence, and still employed many of the same men that had ridden bareback or jumped through rings fifteen years before. If their muscles had grown stiffer, the public was not aware of it; and there was that most necessary living to earn.

There was even the patent-medicine wagon, with the performing wolf underneath—a wolf that could do as many tricks as a man, though he absolutely declined to give an exhibition of his cleverness unless it was demanded by one of his masters.

He obeyed even a glance of Para's eye, though Para had never struck him in his life. He loved the man, and he loved Rudolph, who had been a boy when Nemo was a baby wolf, but both had grown up together, save that Nemo was an old wolf now and Rudolph a young man—a singularly handsome young man, too, with a sweetness of expression, a mildness and gentleness of disposition that earned for him the sneering contempt of some of his associates—forced associates in the life that had fallen to him by chance.

But it was to his mistress that Nemo was most devoted—Mistress Dorothy, the gift of the storm.

She had grown into young womanhood during those fifteen years, the sweetest, daintiest, most exquisite girl that one could imagine. Her hair had darkened from that corn-silk yellow that had characterized her as a baby, darkened to a rich, reddish chestnut that clustered about her brow in tender little curls as graceful as they had been in childhood. Her skin was clear and creamy, with a dainty rose-leaf color that came and went with every emotion; her eyes were large and gray, fringed with lashes as black as night, which swept her cheeks lovingly. Her form was as graceful and supple as that of a young gazelle, for she had led the same wild, care-free life, regardless of social customs, that the others had, thoughtless of fashion, living for herself and for those three who were dear to her—Para, the coyote, and Rudolph—Rudolph last, but best always—aye, a thousand times best!

She hated books, but loved music, and played divinely, while her voice was like one of the thrushes in the forest.

In the summer she insisted upon traveling with the circus, simply because Para and Rudolph did, and she would not listen to being separated from either of them, not even for the shortest possible time. But with traveling, there her connection with the circus ended, for she had never been permitted to enter the ring, although she could have won fame and fortune in it if she had ever tried.

The patent-medicine wagon was deserted, for already the ticket-wagon door was open, and men and women were hurrying inside. The band was playing, and the hurry and confusion always consequent upon a performance was in full swing.

Dorothy had entered one of the tents, in search of Rudolph, and found him, dressed in a costume of spangles, all black and white, his long, shapely legs encased in silk tights, his dark, half-curling hair ornamented with a small cap of black and white.

"How handsome you look, Rudolph!" she said, in a low tone. "I like the new suit tremendously. Has Para's come?"

"Yes," he answered, smiling his pleasure at her compliment, "I wish he had worn it before, though."

"Why?"

"I'll tell you afterward. There is my call. I'll come again in a moment, dear."

He sprang away from her and entered the performing-tent, just as another man emerged from a dressing-room. He, too, was dressed in tinsel, and carried a long whip in his hand.

He smiled at sight of Dorothy in her dainty, girlish beauty. It was not a good smile, but rather one that would have caused Rudolph to grind his teeth in rage.

"Good afternoon, Mistress Dorothy," he exclaimed, pausing beside her.

"Good afternoon, Mr. Hastings. Have the whole company new dresses for this occasion? Para has, and Rudolph, and now I see you have one. It is very pretty."

"Thank you! That repays me for the expense, I assure you."

She looked up at him in amazement. There was an expression that was new upon his face.

"Dorothy," he began excitedly, "I have loved you since the very first day that I joined this company and met you, and you have grown into my heart with each hour. Will you be my wife, darling?"

He slipped his arms around her, but she shrank back, her countenance expressing surprise, almost loathing.

"No," she answered disdainfully. "I shouldn't even think of such a thing."

"But I love you!" he urged.

"Oh, no; you are quite mistaken. Indeed you are. Why, I have only spoken to you as a mere matter of politeness. Please don't ever refer to the subject again, Mr. Hastings. It is most distasteful to me."

The haughtiness of the speech angered him. What right had she to speak like that—she, a mere nobody, a dependent upon the bounty of Para and Rudolph.

He caught her by the arm as she would have left him, and forcibly turned her face toward him.

"You don't know what you are saying!" he exclaimed indignantly. "I am one of the most famous riders of the day, and you have no right to look down upon my suit—no right to speak to me as you have done. You have refused me today, but before the end of a year you will come to me and consent most willingly to become my wife. Remember that. Philip Hastings has never broken his word!"

He slipped his arms quickly about her waist and kissed her full upon the lips.

And then she did that which cost her many days of deepest anguish, many nights of unutterable woe.

She raised her strong, athletic hand and struck him full across the mouth, a ring upon her finger striking against his lip and causing the blood to flow.

Philip Hastings' arm dropped from about her. They looked each other squarely in the eye, and, despite her rage, she trembled.

She knew that she had made a bitter, implacable enemy that would last throughout her life.

CHAPTER II.

AN ACCIDENT BEFALLS PARA.

What the immediate result of that blow might have been will never be known, for before the fierce anger had died from Philip Hastings' eyes, Para entered the tent.

He had turned his head to call back to one of his associates, and as his laughing voice rang out, Hastings slipped through the flap and left Dorothy alone with the only father she had ever known.

Her countenance cleared in an instant as she took Para by the shoulders and stood him off to look at him.

"Oh, my!" she exclaimed delightedly, "how magnificent you look! Oh, you extravagant and vain individual! What a princely sum that gorgeous costume must have cost! And don't you look just too lovely! The first thing you know, Para, one of these fine ladies who patronize us will be running away with you. Then what would become of Rudolph and me?"

He patted her cheek lovingly and kissed her between the eyes.

"The danger will not be of my leaving you, but of your leaving Rudolph and me," he answered more seriously than she had spoken. "Some day you will be getting married."

She laughed lightly.

"Not much chance. I never see any one but the circus men, and you have forbidden my having anything to do with them. Para, why did you ever join the circus, when you feel so strongly against it?"

His face changed instantly. A dreamy expression crossed it, and sadness filled the gentle eyes. He kissed her hair tenderly.

"Circumstances, little one," he answered vaguely. "Circumstances are responsible for so much in this life, dear. If anything should ever happen to me, I have tried to provide for you so that 'circumstances' will never drive you into anything. Rudolph knows. God bless you, dear little Dahfy. I wonder if a daughter was ever dearer to a father than you to me?"

He didn't wait for her reply, but slipped out of the tent, as if he were afraid of being mastered by his emotions.

The circus servants were putting securely in place a great cage that was fastened over one of the rings and extended far back over an entrance that led to another tent. They took unusual precautions, and while the band played the vast audience watched them with breathless in-

MORE worthy of space than any mere words of mine is the following poem, sent in by a Southern sister, and written by Lillian Leveridge, a Canadian girl, as a memorial to her only brother, Frank Leveridge, who gave his life in the Great War. Several letters could have been used in the space devoted to this poem but I am sure no one will feel hurt because of this substitution. It is so beautiful in thought and expression that it will appeal to thousands of grief-stricken mothers and sisters whose laddies did not return.—Ed.

A Cry From the Canadian Hills

Laddie, little laddie, come with me over the hills,
Where blossom the white May lilies and the dogwood and daffodils,
For the spirit of spring is calling to our spirits that love to roam,
Over the hills of home, laddie, over the hills of home.

Laddie, little laddie, here's hazel and meadow rue,
And wreaths of the rare arbutus ablooming for me and you,
And cherry and bilberry blossoms, and hawthorn as white as foam,
We'll carry them all to mother, laddie, over the hills at home.

Laddie, little laddie, the winds have many a song,
And blithely and bold they whistle to us as we trip along,
But your own little song is sweeter, your own wit hits merry thrills,
So whistle a tune as you go, laddie, over the windy hills.

Laddie, little laddie, 'tis time that the cows were home,
Can you hear the klingle-klangle of their bells in the greenwood gloam?
Old Rover is waiting, eager to follow the trail with you,
Whistle a tune as you go, laddie, whistle a tune as you go.

Laddie, little laddie, there's a flash of a bluebird's wing,
Oh, hush! If we wait and listen we may hear him caroling.
The vesper song of the thrushes and the plaint of the whippoorwills,
Sweet, how sweet is the music, laddie, over the twilit hills.

Brother, laddie, brother, your childhood is passing by,
And the dawn of a noble purpose I see in your thoughtful eye.
You have many a mile to travel and many a task to do,
Whistle a tune as you go, laddie, whistle a tune as you go.

Laddie, soldier laddie, a call comes over the sea,
A call to the best and bravest in the land of Liberty,
To shatter the despot's power, to lift the weak that fall,
Whistle a tune as you go, laddie, to answer your country's call.

Brother, soldier brother, the spring has come back again,
But her voice from the windy hilltops is calling your name in vain,
For never shall we together 'mid the birds and blossoms roam,
Over the hills of home, brother, over the hills of home.

Laddie, laddie, laddie, somewhere in France you sleep,
Somewhere with alien lilies and alien winds that weep.
Bravely you marched to battle, nobly your life laid down,
You unto death was faithful, laddie, yours is the victor's crown.

Laddie, laddie, laddie, how dim has the sunshine grown,
And mother and I together speak softly in tender tone,
And the lips that quiver and falter have ever a single theme,
As we list for your dear lost whistle, laddie, over the hills o' dream.

Laddie, beloved laddie, how soon should we cease to weep,
Could we glance through the golden gateway, whose keys the angels keep?
Yet love, our love that is deathless, can follow you where you roam,
Over the hills of God, laddie, the beautiful hills of Home.

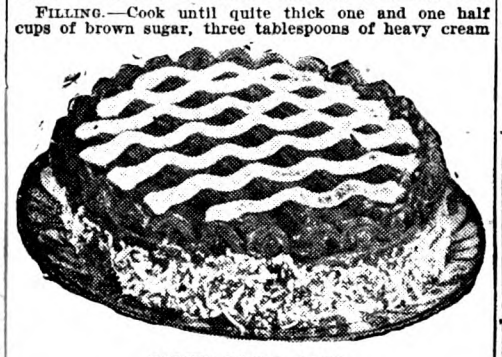
Comfort Sisters' Recipes

IT would have seemed much wiser on the part of our childhood friend, Little Jack Horner, to have picked out a raisin instead of a plum when he risked burned fingers just to show how brave he was. Fat, juicy raisins are infinitely more worth while risking burned fingers for than are plums and if some kind person had told Jack how nourishing and appetizing they were, he surely would have made a different choice. Following are some raisin recipes that have been sent in from time to time by the sisters.—Ed.



RAISIN PUDDING.—Put three ounces of beef suet through meat chopper a couple of times and then work it with wooden spoon until creamy. Put three quarters pound of raisins through food chopper twice and add to suet and blend well together. Have ready two and one half cups of bread-crumbs that have soaked half-an-hour in three quarters cup of milk. To the crumbs add two eggs, well beaten, one cup of sugar and a little salt, about half a teaspoonful. Add this to raisin mixture. Butter mould, and fill two thirds full of mixture and steam three hours. Serve with Foamy Sauce.

FOAMY SAUCE.—Beat the yolk of one egg until thick and of light color; add gradually two thirds cup of powdered sugar, beating all the while. Mix one quarter teaspoon powdered sugar with one and one half teaspoons of corn-starch and one quarter teaspoon salt and add gradually one half cup of scalded milk. Cook in double boiler until mixture thickens. To this add the yolk of egg and flavor with two teaspoons of lemon. When ready to serve add the stiffly-beaten white of egg.

RAISIN CHOCOLATE PIE.—Mix one tablespoon of flour to a smooth paste with one quarter cup of milk. Add one ounce of melted chocolate, one teaspoon of butter, four tablespoons chopped raisins, three tablespoons of sugar, one quarter teaspoon salt and three quarters cup of milk. Cook in double boiler until thick; then add two well-beaten eggs and one teaspoon of lemon. Pour into baked crust and set in hot oven until firm.

RAISIN LAYER CAKE.—One tablespoon of softened butter creamed with one cup of sugar. Add two well-beaten eggs, one tablespoon of cold water and one teaspoon of vanilla and beat all together with the egg beater. Sift together one and one half cup of sifted flour, one half teaspoon of soda and one teaspoon of cream of tartar, and add it alternately with one half cup of sweet milk. Beat hard and bake in shallow tins.

FILLING.—Cook until quite thick one and one half cups of brown sugar, three tablespoons of heavy cream or two of butter, one square of cooking chocolate, one third of a cup of sweet milk and two thirds cup of finely chopped raisins. Stir very frequently to prevent scorching. Add one tablespoon of vanilla, beat a few minutes and spread between cakes. This amount of filling is sufficient for a layer over the top, or a chocolate icing crossed with strips of plain white may be used. A garnish made by sprinkling the soft frosting with shredded cocoanut is attractive.

RAISIN CAKE.—Cream half a cup of butter and one cup of sugar together, beat in the yolks of two eggs, the grated rind and juice of one lemon and stir well together. Into this sift three cups of flour and three tablespoons of baking powder, then add the whites of two eggs, beaten stiff. To this add as many chopped raisins as the mixture will hold. Roll thin, adding more flour if necessary, place in buttered baking tin and bake in quick oven.

RAISIN PUFFS.—One quarter cup sugar, one half cup milk, one teaspoon of cream of tartar, one half teaspoon of soda, one egg, one cup of flour, one half cup chopped raisins, small piece of butter. Steam thirty minutes in cups. To be served with following sauce:

PUDDING SAUCE.—Two thirds cup sugar, and one tablespoon flour mixed well with sugar, then add one cup of boiling water, allowing it to boil till transparent. Remove and add a piece of butter half the size of an egg or less. Beat thoroughly to prevent it appearing on top. Flavor with vanilla.

RAISIN CAKE.—One cup sugar, one quarter cup butter, three eggs, one half cup molasses, one half teaspoon soda dissolved in one half cup sour cream, three cups flour, one cup chopped raisins, one half teaspoon cassia, one half teaspoon cloves, one teaspoon essence lemon.

RAISIN FILLING.—Two coffee cups sugar, two thirds cup milk, butter size of an egg; boil together until thick like caramel. Add one cup raisins stoned and chopped and beat until cold. Chopped walnuts may be used with vanilla flavoring.—M. E. H., Everett, Mass.

APPLES STUFFED WITH RAISINS.—Wash, core and remove most of pulp from ten large apples. Through a food chopper put two cups of raw apples, one and one half cups of seeded raisins and add one tablespoon of lemon juice. Fill the apple shells with this mixture and place on buttered baking tin. Make a sauce of one cup of water, three quarters cup of sugar and one tablespoon of butter. Pour this over the apples and bake in moderate oven half an hour.—MISS V. M. H., Oregon.

STUFFED PEPPERS WITH RICE.—Take four medium-sized, fresh green peppers; cut a slice from the top, saving it to replace. Remove all seeds, and soak twenty minutes in a quart of water to which one and one half tablespoons of salt has been added. Rinse in cold water, press in filling and replace top, securing it with a toothpick. Place in a baking pan with a little water in the bottom and bake thirty minutes.

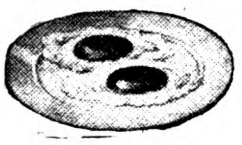
STUFFED PEPPERS AND RICE.

FILLING.—An equal part of minced ham or chicken and toasted bread-crumbs; about two thirds of a cup of each. Add two teaspoons of minced onion, a little fresh tomato, two tablespoons of melted butter unless the ham is fat, and salt and pepper to taste. Serve in a bed of steamed or boiled rice, with a little on top of each pepper, and top with a cut radish.

CEREAL WITH RAISINS.—Cook your favorite breakfast food in usual manner and, just before serving, stir in one cup of seeded raisins to one quart of breakfast food. Serve with cream.

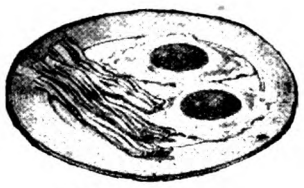
TO STONE RAISINS.—Pour boiling water over them and let them stand five or ten minutes, drain and rub between thumb and finger till seeds come out, then chop, if wanted fine.

CREAM CHEESE AND RAISIN SANDWICHES.—Mash cream cheese and moisten with salad dressing. Have bread cut in thin slices, graham bread is better, butter and spread with the cream cheese and cover with a sprinkling of finely chopped raisins. Press the slices of bread together and toast before serving. Chopped walnuts add to this wonderfully. If used, they should be spread over the raisins.



RAISIN SANDWICHES.—Chop one cup each raisins and walnuts together and mix with salad dressing. Spread between thin slices of buttered bread.—MRS. L. K. D., San Antonio, Texas.

High Living



which costs only one cent per dish

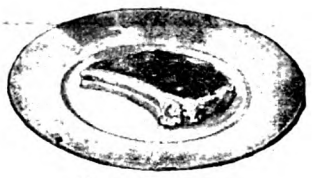
The Quaker Oats breakfast is the height of good living, for the oat is the greatest food that grows.

Practically every element the body needs is there in right proportions. And in a luscious food. No price could buy a better breakfast for the grown-up or the child.

Two eggs—8c

With bacon—14c

Yet you serve a large dish for one cent—the cost of a bite of meat.



Quaker Oats yields 1810 calories of nutriment per pound. It supplies sixteen elements in well-balanced form. A pound of round steak yields 890 calories, and of eggs 635.

One cup of Quaker Oats contains as many calories as a pound of fish.

Food values

Note how foods differ in the cost per calory. These comparisons on necessary foods are based on prices at this writing.

Cost per 1,000 calories
Quaker Oats	5½c
Average meats	45c
Average fish	50c
Hen's eggs	60c

One chop—12c

Fish serving—8c

85% less for breakfast

A Quaker Oats breakfast saves 85 per cent compared with the average meat breakfast. It supplies supreme nutrition for the first meal of the day. It saves the average family about 35 cents towards costlier foods for dinner.

Quaker Oats

The choicest one-third of the oats

In Quaker Oats you get just queen grains flaked. All the puny, insipid grains are discarded. A bushel of choice oats yields only ten pounds of Quaker. Yet these rich, flavory oat flakes cost you no extra price. Be wise enough to get them.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

CONCLUSION.

A FEW days' rest together with the tonic of her great new happiness, served to do much toward restoring Violet to her old, sweet, bright self, and the first time she was able to sit up, she insisted upon being wheeled into Mr. Lawrence's room to pay him a visit.

He greeted her with all a parent's affection, and she expressed her gratitude and pleasure in being once more "at home."

"I did not know how dear it had become to me, until I was forced to remain away," she said, while the tears started to her eyes.

"It is a great comfort to me to hear you say that, dear," replied Mr. Lawrence, tenderly patting the hand that he was holding. "And now," he added, smiling archly, "how about that adoption business?—you are going to belong to me whether you will or not."

"How so?" Violet questioned.

"I suppose that Wallace has told you of the relationship that exists between us."

"Yes, he has told me that his mother was your cousin."

"And one would think that gave me but a doubtful claim upon you, eh?" said her companion, playfully. "Well, dear, it at all events makes him nearest of kin, and half of all my possessions have been willed to him—the other half is to go to a certain little lady whom I would be glad to have sign some papers which I have had prepared."

"I will sign them, dear Mr. Lawrence," Violet said, with one of her charming smiles—"not for the 'possessions,' mind you," she interposed, with an independent toss of her small head and smiling archly, "for I am to have a fortune of my own now, you know; but for the privilege of being a real daughter to you. Who would ever have imagined that your nearest of kin would have turned out to be my—husband?" she concluded, with a pretty blush over that last word.

Every day after that she went in to sit with him, cheering him with her bright presence, ministering to him in a hundred ways, and always reading for an hour or more from his papers or some interesting book.

One afternoon, while so engaged, a servant brought her a card saying there was a lady below who wished to see her.

Violet blushed, though she also smiled with pleasure as she saw the name of "Agnes Humphrey" engraved upon its polished surface.

She arose and went slowly down-stairs, wondering how she should meet Miss Humphrey—wondering if she knew that she had once been pledged to marry Lord Cameron.

She was not long left in doubt as to the greeting she was to receive from that young lady, for Miss Humphrey arose as she entered the room and came forward with both hands outstretched, and when she reached her she put her arms around her and kissed her upon the lips.

"You will perhaps think me guilty of great familiarity, Mrs. Richardson," she said, flushing after the impulsive act, "but truly I could not help it; I am so glad, and so sorry, and so delighted——"

They both laughed outright now, over this eager contradiction of terms, and then Miss Humphrey continued:

"It is every word true," she said; "I am 'so glad' to know you—I have wanted to make your acquaintance ever since that day when you thanked me so sweetly for coming here to sing; and I am 'so sorry' for all the sorrow and trouble that you have had to bear—you perceive I know all about you, as, I suppose, you know all about me," she interposed, blushing, while she searched the fair, sweet face before her.

Violet nodded and smiled.

"I am very glad. I hoped I should not have to explain," said Miss Humphrey, "and now I am 'so delighted' that you are Mr. Richardson's wife and that you will both be happy again after your long separation. Now, isn't this the queerest introduction you ever had in your life?" the charming little lady concluded, with a bright, sweet laugh that found its way straight into the depths of Violet's loving heart.

"It is the very nicest one in the world," she said, her fingers closing more firmly over the daintily gloved hand which she held, "and it is very good of you to come to see me in such a friendly, informal way. I have had scarcely a friend, save Mr. Lawrence, since I came to New York."

"You will not lack in that respect after this, you may be very sure," responded Miss Humphrey, "for I am going to take you under my wing during the little time I remain at home"—this with another blush—"and introduce you to all my most desirable acquaintances. And—and I have one dear friend who is very anxious to see you."

"You mean Lord Cameron?" Violet said, gravely, while she grew pale with repressed feeling as she remembered the last time she saw him, "but I am afraid I do not deserve that he should think kindly of me."

"Why—because your intuitions warned you that you would be doing wrong to keep your pledge with him? Dear Mrs. Richardson," she added, as she saw the look of pain on Violet's face, "let us talk this out freely. Vane has told me everything, and I assure you I am not in the least sensitive over anything that has occurred in the past; I hope I am sensible enough to consider anything in its true light. I know how you went away from Mentone, and though it was, of course, a dreadful shock to everybody at the time, they were all only too thankful afterward, when Mr. Richardson came and explained that you were his wife, and that you had been deceived regarding his death. Vane was very much grieved, too, when he realized how you had been treated. He cherishes only the kindest of feelings toward you, and Lady Cameron loves you dearly."

"Lady Cameron! Is she here in New York?" Violet asked, surprised.

"Yes, and I was to ask you if she might come to see you tomorrow?"

Wallace had not thought to tell her this.

"Yes, indeed—she is very kind," Violet answered, eagerly, and with starting tears, for she was deeply touched by this mark of the beautiful woman's enduring affection. "I loved Lady Cameron very much, and I know, Miss Humphrey, you will enjoy her company exceedingly; what a blessing it must be to have such a mother!" the fair young wife concluded, with a sigh.

"She is perfectly delightful, and I am sure, I am very grateful that, since I must leave my own mother, I am to find another one so congenial in every way," and there were tears in Miss Humphrey's eyes now; for in spite of her flattering prospects it was going to be no light trial to leave her own home and friends.

She spent an hour with Violet, and every moment only served to increase and strengthen their respect and regard for each other.

"You will be my friend, will you not?" Miss Humphrey pleaded, wistfully, when she finally arose to go, and extending her hand for a parting clasp.

Violet grasped it warmly.

"I could not resist you if I would," she said, earnestly, "and I am sure I shall love you dearly."

Agnes Humphrey laughed out happily at this.

"After such an assurance of that I feel at liberty to tell you that Lord Cameron and I have the most delightful plan in the world to propose to you and Mr. Richardson a little later," she said, gaily. "But I must not stay longer now—I shall come again, however, in a few days."

"Do," Violet returned eagerly. "I shall be so glad to have you."

"And may I tell Vane that you will be glad to see him also?"

"Yes," Violet answered, but her face grew very grave.

She dreaded the first meeting with Lord Cameron more than she could express.

Miss Humphrey read something of her feeling, but smiled to herself as she thought that her betrothed would smooth everything when he came.

She then took an affectionate leave of Violet, and went away, but leaving a ray of sunlight behind her that was very cheering to her new friend.

Lord Cameron called that evening, and Violet saw him in the presence of her husband.

He spoke out at once, freely and frankly, of their sad experience at Mentone, expressing his gratitude for their escape from what would have been a life-long sorrow to them both. His only regret was, he said, that she had not felt free to confide in him, trusting to his reverence for her wishes—his earnest desire for her happiness, and thus saved herself from the lonely life of toil that had followed her flight.

"And now, Violet," he said, in conclusion, "I hope you will henceforth allow me to regard you as a dear friend—a sister, if you will, for I have already conceived a brother's love for this noble fellow who is your husband, and I most earnestly desire to merit at least the esteem of his wife."

"You are worthy of my deepest reverence," Violet said, her eyes swimming in tears as she gave him her hand. "I am proud and grateful to know that you wish to be my friend, and I am more glad than I can tell you that your future is so full of promise; Miss Humphrey is charming—lovely."

"Indeed she is, Violet," Lord Cameron returned, his face lighting with pleasure at her words of praise for his betrothed; "and I am very much delighted by your mutual regard for each other. Agnes told me that she gave you a hint of a plan that we had to propose to you; it was almost too bad to excite your curiosity and then leave you in suspense," Lord Cameron said, smiling; "but she wished the proposition to come from me. It is that you and Wallace will accompany us when we go home to England. I am about to dedicate a home for orphans and aged people, and, since Wallace designed the plans for the buildings, I want you both there to honor the occasion."

"Would you like to go, Violet?" Wallace asked.

"Yes, indeed; very much," she answered, eagerly, and the two gentlemen exchanged gratified glances.

They had only that afternoon discussed the plan which was to be decided by Violet's wishes.

"But ought we to leave Mr. Lawrence?" she suddenly added, as she thought that it would seem cruel to go away upon their own pleasure while he was still confined to his bed.

"It will be nearly a month before we sail, and he will doubtless be much better by that time, and as your physician says you must have a change of some kind, and recommends a sea voyage, I know that he would rather have you go than stay," Wallace replied, and thus the matter was decided.

Lady Cameron came the day following her son's call, and Violet felt as if she ought to be very happy and grateful to have the arms of love and friendship thrown around her so cordially by these old friends.

"Oh!" she cried, as she clasped Lady Cameron about the neck and hid her tearful face upon her shoulder, "I have felt as if I wanted to hide myself where you could never find me, for it seemed as if you must always regard me with aversion for causing you such sorrow and mortification."

"The experience was far more trying and sad for you, dear, than for us," Lady Cameron replied, tenderly, "and I am sure that none of us feel anything but gratitude for an act which saved us so much more of sorrow. Now, my dear Violet, let us never refer to the subject again; we will be happy in the delightful present and the bright future, and we will be the closest of friends always. I hope you will come often to see us in our English home, and we shall want to visit New York occasionally. Dry your tears, my child, and let them be the last that you ever shed over what has only resulted in good to us all."

She kissed the fair face upon her breast, and, with her own handkerchief, dried the dewy eyes, while Violet felt that she should always love her with an affection second only to that bestowed upon her husband.

Lady Cameron spent the entire day with her, and when she at last returned to her rooms at the Hoffman, Violet felt as if the last cloud had vanished from her sky.

The days went by on rapid wings after that. Violet improved wonderfully, and was once more the light of Mr. Lawrence's beautiful home, although at times her nerves reminded her that they had had a severe strain, and she was still somewhat pale and thin.

Mr. Lawrence's injuries mended slowly but surely, and he was very patient during his confinement, and cheerful, too, for Violet was tireless in her devotion to him.

When she demurred against leaving him for a pleasure trip to England, he told her it was his wish that she should go.

"You will not be absent more than a month," he said, "and I am sure you will bring brighter roses in your cheeks when you come back; besides, I have some plans of my own to attend to while you are gone."

About the first of April Wallace took his wife to Cincinnati, where they had no difficulty in securing the property that had been left to her, and where she also spent a few happy days with Nellie Bailey.

On her return Violet tried to find Mrs. Mencke, but she had disappeared from the room she had occupied when she had stumbled upon her so strangely, and no one could tell where she had gone.

Wilhelm Mencke was tried for the crime of abduction, found guilty, sentenced to six years of hard labor at Sing Sing.

Meantime Violet had not forgotten Sarah.

As soon as she became able to drive, she and Wallace paid her a visit, and found her earning a scant living by making overalls. Her husband had died in a drunken fit, only a few days after Violet's release, so life was not quite so hard for her, since there were only two of them now to be supported. The little cripple, "Johnnie, poor boy," as she always spoke of him, was a delicate, pretty child, very bright and intelligent, and Violet at once became deeply interested in him. She provided amply for their needs for the present and promised upon her return from Europe to make some permanent provision for her.

We may as well say here that three months later Sarah was the proprietor of a modest fancy goods store, and from that time on made a respectable living for herself and child, while she always regarded Violet as her patron saint.

A visit was paid to the good-natured Irish girl who had mailed Violet's letter to Mr. Lawrence, and she received a fifty-dollar note, as a testimonial of Violet's gratitude for the efficient service.

The hardest hunt of all was for the dumb plumber; but he was found at last, through Sarah's efforts, and amply rewarded for the loss of his pincers.

The wedding of Lord Cameron and Miss Agnes Humphrey was a brilliant affair.

The marriage ceremony was performed in the church where Miss Humphrey had so long delighted people with her entrancing voice, and it was most artistically decorated for the occasion by her numerous friends.

The bride was beautiful in ivory satin and point lace, with a chaplet and bouquet of exquisite white orchids, the flowers being the gift and worn at the request of the other members of the quartette with whom she had been accustomed to sing.

The reception afterward was delightful, and conspicuous among the friends of Lord Cameron were Violet and her noble husband. Violet was also in bridal attire and looked like the sweet white blossom for which she was named.

The next day the distinguished party sailed for England, where Wallace and his wife were the guests of Lord and Lady Cameron for two delightful weeks, and during which the fine home for orphans and aged people was dedicated, as Lord Cameron had planned, when public mention was made of the "gifted young architect who had designed the elegant and commodious buildings."

Violet was charmed with the grand old home of the Earl of Sutherland, but not one regretful or envious thought at having missed sharing in the magnificence surrounding her, or the title of countess, intruded itself upon her.

She thoroughly enjoyed everything about her, and grew to love her friends more and more, while, when the time came that they must separate, it almost seemed like parting from her own mother, and sister, and brother.

Upon their return to New York, Wallace and Violet found Mr. Lawrence much improved, and just beginning to get about upon crutches. He was in excellent spirits, and of course very happy to have them at home once more.

During their absence he had caused his mansion to be refurnished for their reception, while he had also arranged an elegant suite of rooms in the second story for Wallace's and Violet's exclusive use, and life certainly had a very flattering outlook for the young couple.

A few months later Violet was visiting the city hospital with a friend, when, as she was passing through one of the wards, a slight, quickly-repressed exclamation attracted her attention.

She turned toward the cot from which it had seemed to proceed, and found fixed upon her a pair of eyes, in which there was something strangely familiar.

"Belle!" she cried, gliding swiftly to her side, a profound pity shining through her face.

The woman covered her face with the sheet, and began to sob.

Violet sought the nurse, and questioned her regarding the patient, and learned that Mrs. Moore, as Mrs. Mencke had called herself, had been brought up there while very ill with typhoid fever. She had barely lived through it, but was doing well now, and would be able to leave the hospital in a few weeks.

Violet saw that she was weak, and overcome by the sight of her, so she did not say much to her then; but she went often to see her after that, and though Belle seemed sullen at first, Violet's sweetness and unvarying kindness finally conquered, in a measure, her unfriendly spirit.

When Belle was able to be moved Violet took her to a quiet and pleasant portion of the city, where she had furnished some rooms with every comfort, and many of the elegancies of life, told her that it was to be her home, if she would accept it, and then supplemented this act of generosity by settling upon her an ample annuity.

She went to see her occasionally after this; but though Mrs. Mencke accepted all the benefits which she showered upon her, she never expressed any gratitude or seemed glad to see her—she could not wholly forgive her for being prosperous and happy, while she was dependent for her daily bread.

This, however, made no difference with Violet—she was always the same, sweet, kind, sympathetic little woman under all circumstances, and hoped to conquer even this perverse spirit in time.

Six years passed, and the most perfect harmony prevailed in Mr. Lawrence's stately mansion on Fifth Avenue. Mrs. Davis still retained her position of housekeeper, and thus relieved Violet, who was a most devoted mother to the three little ones who came to claim her care and love.

Lawrence, the eldest, was the especial pride and joy of the genial man for whom he was named.

Agnes Bertha was a fairy-like little girl, with blue eyes and golden hair, but in whose features there was a remarkable blending of father and mother, while Vane, the baby—a sturdy little fellow—bade fair to be a second Wallace.

It was an ideal home, a happy, charming family, and Wallace and his young wife strove from the first to rear their God-given treasures to honor, truth, goodness and nobility of purpose above everything else in the world, and to regard wealth and position as of secondary importance in the great aim of life.

One day Wallace came home from his office, a cloud upon his usually genial face.

"What is it, dear?" asked Violet, who was quick to notice every change upon that loved countenance.

"I met Wilhelm Mencke upon the street today," he answered, gravely.

"Ah! then he is out of——" and Violet shivered slightly as she abruptly paused.

"Yes, he left Sing Sing about a month ago. I did not mention it, dear, because I did not like to revive unpleasant memories. I commissioned a friend to find him some light employment, but the man would not work," Wallace returned.

"I wonder if Belle knows anything about him?" Violet said, musingly.

"I think not; I have known where he lived, and—in fact, I did not like to have the man suffer, and so kept track of him," Wallace replied, flushing slightly, for he did not often mention his charities even to his wife.

"What a good man my husband is," said Violet, bending to touch his brow with tremulous lips, "but there is something more to tell me, is there not?" she asked, for her loving eye saw that the cloud did not lift from his face.

"Yes, Violet, the man is dead!"

"I thought so," she said, quietly, but her voice trembled a little over the words. "Now tell me how?"

"He waylaid me this morning as I was going to the office—he was very much under the influence of liquor, and demanded money from me. I would not give it to him, but told him to come with me and I would give him a good breakfast. He immediately flew into a towering rage, fell in a fit upon the sidewalk, and in ten minutes expired."

It was even so. Wilhelm Mencke had served his time in prison, then returned immediately to his old habits. He would not work, but lived upon Wallace's bounty, though he spent nearly everything upon drink, without experiencing the slightest feeling of shame at being thus dependent.

Wallace had determined, previous to meeting him upon this morning, not to give him any more money, but had planned for a comfortable and permanent home for him, so that he would not suffer for the necessaries of life.

This benevolent scheme was frustrated by his sudden death.

He immediately assumed the responsibility of caring for his remains, gave orders that every outward show of respect be accorded them, and then personally notified Mrs. Mencke of what had occurred.

Violet went to her immediately and showed her every kindness which her tender heart could suggest, and, with her husband, accompanied her as she followed her husband's body to its last resting-place, which had also been provided at Wallace's expense.

These last acts of Christian charity completely broke the woman's proud spirit; she confessed her wrong-doing, begged their forgiveness, and was from that hour the grateful friend and a changed woman.

Every alternate year Wallace and Violet made a trip to England for a short holiday, and these visits were returned by the Camerons, who were entertained sometimes at Wallace's elegant residence on the Hudson, at others in his villa on Long Island, and every year the friendship between the two families became more sacred and enduring.

Nellie Bailey, who became Mrs. Ralph Henderson, shortly after the reunion of Violet and Wallace, also exchange visits with her old-time friend, and Mrs. Alexander Hartley Hawley never neglects an opportunity, when Violet is in Cincinnati, to give her a brilliant reception.

Once Wallace and his wife visited Mentone, where they sought until they found the home of Lisette Vermilet. The stepfather was dead, but the mother, who still sorrowed for her lost child, carried on the small farm with the aid of her two sons. Violet tenderly told her the story of her meeting with Lisette, and all that befell the unfortunate girl after the parting. Then together they all visited the grave beneath the mammoth beech tree where Wallace afterward caused to be erected a pretty marble tablet, bearing the name and age of the girl.

The firm of Hawley and Richardson is as prosperous as ever, and Wallace, who is now the acknowledged heir of the wealthy banker, is already beginning to be looked upon as one of New York's richest men.

In Wallace Richardson's library there hangs a picture which he often shows and explains to his children.

It represents an angel, of great beauty, holding a pair of balances in her hands. Upon one of the disks there is an immense lump of gold upon which is emblazoned an imposing coat of arms. Upon the other there is a carpenter's plane and saw, and thrown carelessly over them is a scroll, upon the spotless surface of which are written the words, "Honor, Truth, Virtue." The scales tip decidedly toward the scroll.

"Truths on which depend our main concern,
Shine by the side of every path we tread,
With such a luster, he that runs may read."

THE END.

AUDREY'S RECOMPENSE

By Mrs. Georgie Sheldon

This charming double romance, in which two thrilling love tales of opposite trend are interwoven, will run as a serial in COMFORT, beginning with a large installment in our October issue.

When a man who is already betrothed to the idol of his heart finds that, through circumstances beyond his control, he has come under equal obligation to marry another woman whose love he has won innocently and unintentionally, but to whom his heart does not respond, what in good conscience should he do?

In such a dilemma at least one heart is bound to be broken. The man will naturally choose to make good with the woman he loves. But perhaps she may balk, when she learns of the tangle, and not let him have his way.

If so, should he, will he marry the other woman? And what about the other mysterious lover that crosses their path?

Read how this game of hearts is played as dramatically told in "Audrey's Recompense."

Don't miss the opening chapters of this pathetic story coming next month.

Modern Underground Life

The first abode of man was a cave or dug-out that he scratched out with his finger nails. In modern cities, land is so high priced, that builders find it advantageous to burrow under the ground for commercial purposes. In New York City alone more than a million people spend part of the day beneath the street level and many come to the surface so seldom that the natural light nearly blinds them. Nearly every great sky-scraper has four or five stories under ground. There are basements and cellars and subcellars and machinery rooms and vaults and conduits. To accommodate these an excavation of forty or fifty feet is required. One who has never explored the subterranean annex of a huge office building would find many surprises in doing so. There you will see grimy men shoveling tons of coal into cavernous fiery mouths, dozens of complicated machines working with scarcely any noise, switchboards and gauges and telephones and wires and signal systems cluttering the walls, and here and there a uniformed official treading about to see that everything is working properly. A small army of employees including firemen and engineers and electricians and watchmen and janitors and steamfitters find daily work in the bowels of the earth and even during the still hours of the night all is life and activity beneath the modern hives of industry.

Moments are little things, yet by their proper use a book may be read, a picture may be painted, a profession may be learned, and a life made useful.

Warren G. Harding
FOR PRESIDENT

Calvin Coolidge
FOR VICE-PRESIDENT

Here's what HARDING did for you

your home and your country

Harding is for peace, for peace at home and abroad.

Therefore, he fought against those Treaty commitments that would involve your country in European wars.

He voted to recall your soldiers from Russia.

He fought for the safety of your sons and the peace of your home.

He worked for the welfare of your children.

He supported the child labor law.

He worked for the good of your bread-winners.

He supported the minimum wage law for women in industry, the civil service retirement law and the rehabilitation industrial cripple law.

He worked to lower the cost of living. He voted for the law against cornering the market on food-stuffs.

He worked for woman suffrage.

He not only voted for the amendment in the Senate, but he personally assisted in ratification in several states.

He is Harding, the Man, who once was Harding the farm-boy, who later worked his way through college by painting barns, driving teams, teaching school and setting type.

From Harding, the ink-stained printer, he became Harding, the newspaper publisher, owner of the Marion, Ohio, Star, and a force for good in his home town.

Recognizing in him the stuff that makes the true public servant, his community sent him as their representative to the Ohio State Legislature for two terms. They next honored him as lieutenant governor. Then, in 1914, he was sent to the United States Senate.

Thus, from obscurity, Warren G. Harding rose to a position of honor, content to acquire only the modest means that would enable him to devote his time and thought mainly to public service.

Today, he is Warren G. Harding, Republican candidate for President of the United States, but he is still the Harding that the town folks knew as a printer.

He is still the same Warren G. Harding, living his beautiful and simple family life in his modest Marion home, where his neighbors are his boyhood friends.

Like Harding, Calvin Coolidge of Massachusetts, the Republican candidate for Vice-President, was born on a farm, at Plymouth, Vermont. His simplicity, his Americanism, strength of character and of purpose, his faith in the Republic are Harding-like.

Unknown and unsponsored, by his own efforts Calvin Coolidge rose to be Governor of the great Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and his record as an executive of that state demonstrates that he is of presidential stature—a man who when the hour demanded, forgot politics and enforced the principles of law and order that the home might be protected.

When Harding goes to the White House, he will call into his councils and his cabinet the ablest among the many able of the Republican party—the party founded by Lincoln, and which, since the Civil War, has ever wisely guided the destinies of the country in days of stress, when human problems press for solution.

Cubby Bear's Heroism

By Lena B. Ellingwood

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

CUBBY Bear and Bunny Rabbit were sitting on the doorstep of Bunny's house one pleasant morning, laughing to see the Bunny Babies roll and tumble around on the grass at play, when Shinyblack Crow came hopping sedately along.

"You look very happy here," he said. "May I stop and talk with you a while?"

"Oh, yes! we will be glad to have you!" answered Bunny, moving over to make room for him on the steps.

Shinyblack Crow took the place between Bunny and Cubby on the top step.

"Ha-caw! ha-caw!" he laughed, as one Baby Bunny tripped up another one at play. "Your babies are growing plump and playful, Bunny Rabbit! They are pretty, too, so furry and soft. Much, much prettier than another family of babies I saw today!"

"You would have to go far to find such a family as mine," said Bunny, his face glowing with pride. "But whose babies did you see?"

"I was down in the swamp by the river," said Shinyblack Crow, "when I heard the loud boom of Benjamin Bittern."

"Oh, I have seen the bittern," interrupted Cubby Bear. "I was in his swamp one time!"

"I remember," nodded Shinyblack Crow. "You were lost, and Billy Bluejay showed you the way home. Well, I found both Benjamin and Mrs. Bittern standing by their nest, which was built on the ground, admiring their four awkward scrawny babies, whose feathers are only half-grown. When they saw I meant them no harm, they were glad to show me their children."

The Bunny Babies had left their play, and crowded around the doorsteps, listening to Shinyblack Crow, their eyes large and round.

"We want to see the baby bitterns in their nest on the ground!" they exclaimed.

"It is a long way to where they live!" Bunny Rabbit told them.

"We are going to see the baby bitterns!" they insisted.

"Do not tease!" said Bunny Rabbit, whereat they all began to cry, sobbing in a woeful way that touched Cubby Bear's tender heart.

"Oh, please," he whispered to Bunny; "let us take them to the swamp in their little cart. I know the way, and I will help you wheel them."

"Very well, then, since you will help," agreed Bunny; "but they have never been so far from home before."

The Bunny Babies were washed, and brushed, and fed, and then packed into their little cart, which they were outgrowing. Joyfully they set out upon their journey.

"It is a long way," said Cubby, who was wheeling the cart. "All the way south through our forest until we reach the road that leads to the village; across the road and down through a long field that slopes until we come to the river; then along the bank of the river to the low, marshy land, overgrown with alder bushes, and there we shall find Benjamin Bittern's home."

It would not have been hard for either Cubby or Bunny to take the trip by themselves, but with the cart they were obliged to go slowly, and it was afternoon before they reached the swamp.

The bitterns did not seem pleased to have callers at first, and the Bunny Babies were a little afraid of the great birds with their long legs and fierce looking bills; but Cubby Bear was politeness itself, and soon they were on more friendly terms.

The Baby Bunnies stood in a circle around the nest, and one of them put out a timid little paw to smooth the young birds' feathers.

"Oh, let the little bitterns have a ride in our cart," offered one of them in a glow of generous feeling.

"No, no, no!" refused Mrs. Benjamin Bittern quickly. "They must stay in their nest. I would not risk their lives in such a crazy contraption!"

The afternoon was nearly gone when Cubby and Bunny started on their way back to the Pleasant Forest.

"We have had a happy day," murmured the Baby Bunnies drowsily. "Now we will sleep all the way home."

"You need not hurry, Cubby Bear," said Bunny. "For I shall not cross the road until after dark. When we crossed it today, I saw something I thought was a man. He was some distance away, so I couldn't be sure. Alone, I could go so swiftly I should be safe; but with my babies, I shall not try again to cross the road by daylight!"

CUBBY BRAVELY STOOD HIS GROUND IN THE GLARING LIGHT, FLOURISHING HIS PAWS THREATENINGLY, AND GROWLING AS SAVAGELY AS HE KNEW HOW.

So they loitered along, stopping now and then to rest, while the shadows grew long, and the bright sun sank to rest.

Bunny Rabbit insisted on hiding in the bushes beside the road for some time, although it was already growing dark when they arrived there.

As they were starting across, one sleepy Bunny Baby yawned and stretched, disturbing the others, and two of them began to cry. Bunny Rabbit stopped the cart to cuddle them down comfortably again, when all at once they heard a strange, roaring noise, and around the bend in the road not far distant, came rushing a terrible, great creature, the like of which Cubby Bear had never even dreamed!

Its horrible eyes, each one as big as Mamma Bruin's whole face, it seemed to Cubby Bear, glared at the frightened little group in the road, and lighted up everything around!

Cubby's first thought was to run, but what about the helpless little Bunny Babies? No, he could not desert them!

"Run, Bunny Rabbit!" he shouted, "and save your babies! I will stop him until you are out of the way!"

So while Bunny made off as fast as he could, dragging the cart behind him, Cubby bravely stood his ground in that glaring light, flourishing his paws threateningly, and growling as savagely as he knew how!

But the monster, though it stopped in its tracks, kept up such a clatter all the while that Cubby feared it could not even hear his growl!

Oh, ought he to run now? Would the Bunny Babies be safely out of sight?

Then the creature screeched at him, a wild "Honk, honk!" and started toward him once more. In another instant it would have run him down, but he turned and fled, wildly, blindly, into the night, never thinking or caring what direction he took. Anywhere, anywhere, to get away!

On he went, across the open field, toward the great river, fear urging him on. Never had he run so fast before!

Too late to stop in his mad flight, he saw the gleam of water beneath him, and heard the gentle murmur of the smoothly flowing river.

In he plunged, straight to the bottom, then came to the surface, gasping for breath.

A little log was near him. He clawed at it desperately, trying to save himself from drowning by climbing up on it; but the slender log rolled with each eager clutch.

Poor Cubby paddled away at the rolling log until his strength gave out, then once more sank in the river's depths.

Coming up the second time, he gathered together his scattered wits, winked the water out of his eyes, and struck out bravely for the shore.

"How foolish I was not to swim at first," he said to himself, "instead of trying to climb on the log! But I was too frightened to think! Mamma Bruin will laugh at me when I tell her!"

He was not used to swimming, but he made good headway. The bank over which he had fallen was too steep for him to climb up, and he had to swim a little way up stream before he could land.

He lay panting on the bank for a while, then slowly started for home.

Across the broad field and up the slope once more, he looked cautiously up and down the road, but all was dark and quiet. He made the remainder of the journey in safety, and when he reached Mamma Bruin's house at last, stumbled over a little cart by the door.

Bunny Rabbit and his Baby Bunnies were in the house, and Mamma Bruin stood by the window, tying on her bonnet.

"Here he comes now!" she cried in relief, as Cubby entered. "I was just going to start out after you!" And she threw both arms around him.

Bunny Rabbit's eyes were running over with tears. He clasped Cubby's paw in both his own.

"You were so brave!" he said. "And so good to face that terrible monster alone, and give me a chance to save my babies! I feared you had been devoured by the fiery creature!"

"It must have been an automobile," said Mamma Bruin. "I have heard of such things, but never saw one. It seems they go only on the roads, which is a mercy! There would be no safety for us if they came crashing through the forest. I wonder that men are not out after them with guns!"

"I shall not take my babies on the road again," declared Bunny Rabbit firmly. "We will keep to the Pleasant Forest, where we shall be safe from harm!"

A Queer Race

South America is the home of many peculiar divisions of the human family. The low caste Indians of Chile are among the strangest of these. They build their houses out of branches in quite thorough fashion but know absolutely nothing about floors, windows or chimneys. Their manner of cooking is extremely antiquated and primative. A fire is made in a stone-lined hole in the ground and into the hole is dumped all they have to cook,—meat, fish, fowl, vegetables, anything, in fact; all in one mess. If any space is unfilled, hot stones are piled around the grub, the top of the hole being finally sealed with mud. Very little heat can escape and no matter what the contents of the primitive oven may be, it is certain to be pretty well done after four or five hours of this kind of cooking; nor is there any chance of the food being burned. Strange as it may seem, this method of the savages is identical, in principle, with the modern fireless cooker. The food is not put in the hole in the first place until the fire has died to embers. When it is sufficiently done, all hands, including dogs and hogs and pet monkeys gather to the feast, eating ravenously out of the hole. The natives use their fingers for forks and have teeth almost as strong as the animals. It is said by travelers that the odor of the food is savory and inviting and that the people would share their last bite with a stranger.

Crumbs of Comfort

Youth is the fire of life.
Profit by your mistakes.
Habit is older than reason.
Do not carve your own yoke.
Defeat is often a spur to victory.
Wrongs should be written in ashes.
He is gentle that does gentle deeds.
Sometimes a stumble prevents a fall.
If you do not try you cannot succeed.
Science is stranger than superstition.
Fear yourself; not the power of others.
Modern inventions have killed isolation.
You can either season or decay with age.
Patience is the best plasterer to heal hurts.
The things that count are the things that last.
You cannot kill time without injuring eternity.
A good book is the life-blood of a master-spirit.
A good many of us mistake action for progress.
The prize apple is always at the top of the tree.
Never try to tan a dog's hide with his own bark.
There is a better market for smiles than frowns.
The feet of the years fall noiseless in their tread.
Gracious denials are better than angry yieldings.
The line of least resistance makes a poor lifeline.
Make sure the prize you chase is worth the price.
Nothing is politically right which is morally wrong.
We should impart our courage and not our despair.
The heart is often willing, but the pocketbook weak.
A good job of mending is the patching up of a quarrel.
You have no idea how big the other fellow's troubles are.
A busy man never has time to tell how much work he does.
Man flows at once to God when the channel of purity is open.
Good times for all can only be the product of good work by all.
There are times when nothing speaks so eloquently as silence.
There is plenty to do everywhere for him who can and will do it.
Anything that is standing still is getting ready to move backwards.
Sweating will get you farther than swearing; let mules do the kicking.
The hen is the only creature that can sit still and produce dividends.
Other men's sins are before our eyes, but our own are behind our back.
More than fame and more than money is the hearty approval of a friend.

HOP up onto my lap and I'll give you a few things to think over. So many houses, flats and tenements have been torn down in the cities to make room for movie theaters and garages and places of fun and frolic, that homes are being pushed off the map, and though people have plenty of places to shimmy and jazz, they have nowhere to lay their heads, do their cooking, washing, laundry and raise their families. Dickens said the law was a "hass," but this war has definitely established the fact that the greatest "hass" in the world is that peculiar type of animal that calls itself man and wanders around raising Cain everywhere, instead of going to a lunatic asylum and staying there for the rest of his days.

You folks are so busy with your farms and other affairs that you have little time to read and study, and the great metropolitan dailies seldom reach you. In this respect you are lucky, for if you knew what was going on in the world and had to carry its cares, burdens, crimes and follies on your heart as I do, and knew all the secret forces that are working to destroy you, you'd throw up your hands and quit. These are great times for the dis-United States. In Michigan, the Bureau of Crop Estimates place the idle acreage in that State at 1,668,000. There were 10,000 vacant farm houses and 18,232 idle farms, 10,000 of which had been abandoned this year owing to the increased cost of operation and the high wages being paid in the cities. People wanted oceans of money and they are getting it, but it is cheap stage money that won't buy them anything. You can have real money only as you create wealth, for money is worthless unless it represents commodities and the ability to command service. Cheap money means high prices and dear food. A lady in Kiev, Russia, was displaying neat ankles encased in silk stockings. Those stockings had cost her fifteen hundred dollars, and were of the kind you used to buy for sixty-nine cents, and she has no soap with which to wash either her stockings or herself. When people run away from the country, from their bread and butter, to make joy-riding flivvers in the cities, for big wads of stage money, they will soon find that cities hold nothing for them but starvation. There are certain natural and economic laws that man must observe or perish. We are trying to run things upside down, trying to buck against nature, and if you fool with nature you suffer and perish. No good crying "Back to the land," when street sweepers can earn $77 a week, because people, until faced with starvation, will not go back. Well, if you prefer flivvers to bread, and movies to food, don't go on a strike or go Bolshevik and make a bigger "hass" of yourself than you are now doing. Remember, it will be nobody's fault but your own, if in a little while you are paying a dollar for a loaf and fifty cents for a pint of milk. If you prefer excitement, pleasure and gasolene to home and food, go to it, but don't everlastingly whine or damn our social system, because you prefer to be a "hass" to a human. Before the war, an expert mason could, and would, lay 1,900 bricks a day for five dollars. In England, where organized labor is practically in control, in prewar days they used to lay a paltry 350 bricks. English labor was under the ruinous influence of the ca' canny or go-easy movement. The "great idea" was for everyone to do as little as possible. The British workman thought if he laid 700 bricks daily, instead of 350, he would be depriving a fellow-workman of employment. He could not see that with high-speed production in America and Germany all his trade was drifting from him to his rivals and that he was cutting off his nose to spite his face. He was closing down his own factories, ruining his own industries, cutting his own throat because he had permitted himself to become the victim of a false, foolish and iniquitous idea which was bound to ruin his country and himself. A false philosophy of life and a defiance of a basic economic principle was menacing his existence. Hundreds of thousands of houses are needed in England today, but thanks to the pre-war ca' canny movement, the "go-easy" poison, the worker has no place to lay his head, and he wants to go Bolshevik and divide up the money of people who worked and saved while he loafed. The poor "hass." Now we have adopted the old ca' canny British fallacy. It is not the paying of high wages to which the employer objects, but to the fact that after he has paid the big wage he gets practically nothing in return. Building and pretty nearly everything else but jazz is at a standstill in this vast city. "Ca' canny" has killed it. We are told there will be riots in the fall because of the shortage of houses and the high rents (though rents have only gone up 30 or 40 per cent while everything else has soared to 100 per cent), and the gentlemen who will do the rioting are the ones who could have built the houses and wouldn't. But they will build movie theaters, the garages and the dance halls, for that means fun, racket and foolishness. It is the go-easy movement and class hatred that breeds Bolshevism.

And now I will tell you a little about the fanatics who head that movement and what they are doing. Bolshevism is spreading, as it is bound to spread where men have lost morale, spirit, and have slumped back into that class so well known to all Americans, the Weary Willies and the hoboes. Some writers, pessimistic and gloomy, have declared that civilization carries within itself the germ of its own decay. They declare man can climb just so high, then he slips back into the mud again, and all that he has created goes with him. My answer to these croakers is that civilization, like Christianity, has never been tried. Civilization that has merely a material basis like the Berger, Hillquit brand of socialism, is mere bellyism and is bound to decay. A civilization, however, that has a spiritual basis, is a thing of life and will last forever. That is the civilization we must and will build.

Meanwhile, the God-hating, atheistic, militaristic, class terrorists, Bolsheviks, are busier than ever. Like the Kaiser, they are out for world domination and must go on or perish. If they stopped long enough to think, that would be their finish. We are threatened with a dictatorship of the proletariat—the proletariat means the "workers or shirkers." You may get an idea of what dictatorship of the proletariat means when I tell you the proletariat has no power, no freedom of assembly, no free speech or free press. The Russian is a slave—a "hass." The dictating is done by the twin Czars, Lenine and Trotzky, who are supported by a band of murderers called Commissaires, who attend to all the hanging and shooting while the workers are driven around at the point of the bayonet. Lloyd George of Great Britain thought the only salvation of Europe was to put Russia, which is the largest part of it, "in circulation." He was willing to exchange manufactured articles for raw materials and so supply the Russian Soviets with many things they greatly need. We, too, are now going to experiment along the same lines so as to head off the lying Bolshevist sympathizers who say we have been starving Russia. Well, it is always best to starve a wild beast, feeding only gives him power to do more harm. Any goods sent to Russia will eventually find their way into the hands of the Reds. If Russia pays for these things, it will be in stolen gold or raw materials torn from the hands of the peasants. While Lloyd George was engaged in this business, which many condemned though his motives were sincere and honest, Lenine had agents in England and India trying to spread Bolshevik propaganda of world revolution, and the same game is going on here. That is the way those rascals act. These fanatics, too, have a big school of propaganda in Moscow. There they have gathered the turbulent spirits of the Orient and are striving to set all Asia aflame. Many British haters will rejoice if they succeed, but if they do, we in time will reap the full benefit of this back-wash of Oriental fanaticism, with its usual accessories of bloodshed, starvation, plunder and wholesale murder. Here is what our Secretary of State says about the Russian Soviet lunacy: "While this government has no desire to interfere with the internal affairs of the Russian people or to suggest the kind of government they should have, the existing regime in Russia does not represent the will or consent of any considerable proportion of the Russian people. It (Bolshevism) repudiates every principle of harmonious and trustful relation whether of nations or of individuals, and is based upon the negation of honor and good faith and every usage and convention underlying the structure of international law." Now chew that over, for it is God's truth.

Now comes the biggest joke of all. Emma Goldman, who with her friend Berkman, raised Cain and preached anarchy in this land for over a quarter of a century, was deported as an undesirable citizen to her beloved Russia some months ago. Emma longed for that gorgeous paradise of blood, disease and murder which she desired to force upon us. Well, Emma has been home some months and does not like her Soviet Russia for shucks. She is crazy to get back to the wicked old U. S. A. Here is what she thinks of Lenine and Trotzky's paradise: "It is rotten, so rotten that I am sick of it," and she adds: "Soviet Russia has taken away even the little freedom that man has under individual capitalism and has made him entirely subject to the whims of a bureaucracy which excuses its tyranny on the ground that it is all done for the welfare of the workers." And still the nuts want that red dope here. The British Labor Party, the oldest and most radical organization of its kind in existence, was invited to send a delegation to Russia. Of course, like all others who have been on official missions, they have been allowed to see only what little old Jew Trotzky thought was good for them to see, and in their report they say: "Soviet Russia could teach Western Europe nothing." And if ever socialism comes, "It will prevail in Great Britain long before it would in Russia." In 1920, the nationalized industries in Russia, even though the "free and noble working man" toiled with a gun pointed at his head, ran behind twenty-three billion roubles.

The travesty of government that exists in Russia today can only be upheld by force or favor. John Spargo, the greatest authority in this country on Marxian socialism, but as bitter an enemy of Bolshevism as I am, has written three remarkable books on Soviet Russia, published by the Century Company, New York. You ought to get them. Now, William English Walling, one of the world's leading socialist authorities, has written "Sovietism, the A. B. C. of Bolshevism," an authoritative and masterly work, which exposes the villainies of these red fiends. It is published by E. P. Dutton, New York. It would pay you extreme radicals to get this work, even if you have to pawn your silk shirts to do it. Both Spargo and Walling refrain from theorizing. They take Bolshevik documents and condemn these red villains out of their own vile mouths. For instance, Spargo, writing in the Century Magazine for May says: "One is staggered by the statement published in the Red Gazette, a Bolshevist organ, that in Ivanovo-Boznessensk, a town of less than 140,000 inhabitants, 41,000 persons are employed in the administrative department alone, while nearly 20,000 are connected with various public services, commissions and so on." Even our New York Hibernian Tammany Hall, with Charlie Murphy at its head (and "where did you get it" Croker in the distance), could hardly beat that. This always happens in a land terrorized by fanatics. Hordes of officials are given easy jobs and a gun to keep the masses of the people in subjection. Of this cancerous growth, which like the flu is spreading all over the world and which the bums, tramps and loafers want to introduce here so they can get at your Liberty Bonds, your savings banks, your women folks (especially those who have got painted faces and cootie garages over their ears), John Spargo says in May Harpers: "As one of the millions who have seen in socialism the hope and promise of a larger individualism, I frankly admit that I would rather be hungry in any capitalistic nation I know than be ever so well fed in such a servile Utopia. Better rags and a crust of bread with freedom than fine raiment and rich fare with servitude." So say all the socialists of the world, except the Milwaukee and Kansas bunch who find socialism a convenient medium for relieving the worker of his spare dollars. As a matter of fact, there is no socialism in Russia. Lenine got his ideas largely from the late Daniel De Leon, who headed an organization called "The People's Labor Party," and who was an old friend of mine.

You will doubtless wonder why Poland attacked Russia when in dire need of nearly everything that makes life worth while. Poland knew that with Dennikin disposed of she was to be overwhelmed. The plans were drawn for a campaign against her, so, knowing that the one who attacks has all the advantages over him who defends. Poland struck first. Those who have been in Russia and are most capable of judging say that Bolshevism has no economic, political or industrial basis. It is just a sect that regards religion as dope for the workers, hates God and all that we hold sacred and must continue its work of tyranny and propaganda for the benefit of the fiends who run the machine, for if that machine stops, Bolshevism will go to pieces. Kaiserism is a thing of the past, and if civilization is to survive, Bolshevism must be fought tooth and nail for it is as deadly a disease as the black plague which, by the way, is spreading along our gulf ports. Civilization is in danger. Keep a level head, and for pity's sake turn a deaf ear to all the mad fanatics who want to destroy your country and make you as crazy as themselves.

Don't forget that Uncle Charlie's four wonderful books may still be had. Start in at once to obtain them—they cost you no money, only a very little time and effort—and keep at it until you have the entire set. The book of Poems is beautifully bound in ribbed silk stiff covers; the Story Book is bound in two styles, the one in ribbed silk stiff covers like the Poems, the other in paper covers; the Song Book is bound only in heavy paper covers, and the Picture Book in handsome stiff covers. Poems or the Story Book in ribbed silk covers, either one for a club of three subscriptions; the Song Book or the Story Book in handsome paper covers or the Picture Book in pretty stiff covers for a club of only two subscriptions. These four books are a library of endless joy and merriment, the best medicine to drive away the blues and the best gifts in the world.

My Picture Book, too, has started a deluge of inquiries: Is Billy the Goat my daughter? Is Maria her ma? Is there an Aunt Charlie? Is the big boy in the Picture Book my only baby? I have had a little leaflet specially printed answering all these questions fully, and those who are interested will find the same in every copy of the four Uncle Charlie books sent out this season.

Now for the letters.

Five Things Happen

When you brush teeth in this way

All statements approved by high dental authorities

Dental science has produced a new teeth-cleaning method. Millions of people have already adopted it. Leading dentists everywhere advise it.

In effective ways it combats the film on teeth. And it deals with this tooth wrecker as was never done before.

The fight on film

Modern dentistry finds that most tooth troubles are caused by film. The film at first is viscous. You can feel it now. But it clings to teeth, enters crevices and stays.

It is the film-coat that discolors, not the teeth. Film is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. Very few people have escaped these film-caused troubles.

Ordinary methods do not end this film. So millions who brush teeth daily find they still discolor and decay.

A multiple attack

Now new ways have been found to fight film. Careful tests have proved them. High dental authorities approve them.

They are all combined in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. It meets every modern requirement. And this new tooth paste is fast coming into world-wide use.

You'll know in a week

Some results of Pepsodent appear rapidly. Within one week the good effects will be amazing to you.

One ingredient is pepsin. One multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva, to digest starch deposits that cling. One multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva to neutralize mouth acids.

Two factors directly attack the films. One of them keeps the teeth so highly polished that film cannot easily cling. In all these ways it brings and maintains whiter, safer teeth.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how the teeth whiten as the film-coat disappears.

Compare the results with your old methods. Then let those evident results tell you what is best. Cut out the coupon now.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I would like to be a detective, although I am a girl. I have just completed my freshman year in High school. What studies would you advise me to take up? I want to be one of the kind that experiment in running down clues. Not those that follow the criminals. Please advise me. LOTTIE NETTER.

Lottie, it is quite refreshing to find a young lady who does not want to be a movie actress, a song, story or scenario writer, but, instead, wishes to devote her life to running down clues. You might study the works of Gaboriau and communicate with Conan Doyle, of Sherlock Holmes fame, who not only ran down clues in this world but is now trying to run them down in the next. When you have finished with these masters, you might go to Chicago and San Francisco and try to find a clue that will elucidate the mystery of the late presidential nominations. You might find, too, why a land which once produced great men has to fall back on mediocrities for its presidential timber. If you solve that mystery you will be the champion defective detective of the world. There is a great task, too, for you in running down clues regarding booze. Every time you hear an explosion that sounds like Verdun going into the air you will know someone has put a kick into a barrel of home-brewed beer that has demolished the neighborhood. Then you will have to get a clue to the culprit who applied the kick. It has always been a mystery as to where William Jennings Bryan conceals the billion horse-power mechanism that runs his oratorical jaw tackle. If you can discover that, you are on the road to fame. If William Jennings B. is ever kidnapped and forced by any of his thirsty opponents to swallow a wet plank, there will be millions in it if you can discover the perpetrators. If you can crawl into a German head and discover who is responsible for the mechanism which makes Fritz and Heinie, both here and at home, keep parroting that old dope, "Ve vos der victims of a conspiracy, der var vos vorsed on us," you are booked for a medal. If, too, you will run down the clue that will make known to a suffering world what it is that

by Maud Mary Brown

Presently he was asleep.

"Perhaps you wish you had not married me."

Betty's hands were in his and her ardent face was upturned to meet his eyes.

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

THE eight-ten train was in when Manning reached the station, and, avoiding the club car, he ran down the platform and swung himself to the steps of a coach. Choosing a seat with an empty one behind it, he turned up the collar of his coat, slid to the end of his spine, and gave himself over to moody reflection.

He frowned darkly when two women, breathing heavily from their haste, sank into the seat behind him, and, fearing recognition, he drew his soft hat lower and buried his face in a paper.

For, two days earlier, Manning had won a bitterly fought and difficult case. Always moderately successful in his profession, this triumph had pitchforked him into legal prominence.

Yesterday he had been exhilarated by his victory, but today the inevitable reaction had set in and depression, like a clammy blanket, enshrouded him.

How in the name of high heaven had he done it? His logic, the brilliant phrasing of his plea, were utterly incomprehensible to him now. Almost he regretted his success for it had committed him to a standard which he felt powerless to maintain.

The conversation of the women behind him irritated him but in spite of himself their words trumpeted their way to his brain.

"My dear, she volunteers for everything!"

"I know. And she slides out from under every time."

Manning stirred, intrigued by the hauntingly familiar voices.

"You feel like rending her and directly you are ashamed, her alibi is so convincing. And that pained look in her eyes!"

"That pained look is a distinct asset," laughed the other.

Manning, his nervous brooding forgotten, was frankly listening, wishing devoutly that he could place those voices.

"And her son! The poor little tad! The children on the flats have better care."

"I feel so sorry for him. Mrs. Mason says that the doctor is in despair. He eats anything at any time. Meat at night, if you please, since he was three. No wonder his teeth have needed attention already."

Manning's brain had never been more alert. Of course it was a coincidence, but his own son had had a recent session with the dentist. And Peter was not quite four!

"For a college-bred woman," one of the voices was continuing, "her ignorance is colossal."

"I would say, rather, that her indolence was colossal. Oh, well, we can't make people over, but one has to pity the husbands and children of women like that."

The train drew in at the terminal and Manning, without a backward glance, hurried to the front of the car and lost himself in the crowd.

That morning he denied himself to all but one caller—the head of a corporation whose chief counsel had recently died.

To Brewster, Manning was his usual self—poised, dignified, confidence-inspiring. However, when he was once more alone, he slumped in his chair while beads of perspiration started on his forehead.

"Gad!" he ejaculated, disgusted. "I am a ghastly mess. I am as unnerved as a hysterical woman. I believe I'll see Mason tonight. This will never do."

Manning went out to Brookhurst in the late afternoon, faint from fasting, for at noon the thought of food had revolted him.

Sylvia was in the hall, telephoning, when he entered. She nodded to him, an unsmiling expression on her rather heavy face, a pained look in her blue eyes.

"But I am telling you," she was explaining with weary patience, "that I have not had time to prepare that talk." * * * * * * *

"I am aware that I promised, Mrs. Hatch. Naturally, I couldn't foresee Peter's indisposition. It is hard for you childless women to appreciate the uncertainty of a mother's time." * * * *

"Of course I can't give an impromptu talk on a subject like Americanization. I am sorry. Oh, wait a moment, please. My husband has just come in; he might help you out."

The transmitter pressed against her breast, Sylvia turned to her husband.

"Oh, Roger," she began in a hushed voice, "you are forever preaching Americanization; you might as well have an audience. Won't you speak before the club this evening?"

"I will not, Sylvia."

"Just to help me out, Roger! Mrs. Hatch is cross and I can't afford to offend her."

"Then don't. I infer that you promised——"

"But I planned to prepare that talk yesterday and Peter was ailing."

"He seems to be all right today. I just met him with the nurse. Why didn't you do it this afternoon?"

Again the pained look flooded Sylvia's eyes and her face, already florid at thirty-one, grew ruddier still.

"If you must know, I played bridge," she said sulkily. "Goodness knows I get little enough recreation."

Manning reached for the instrument. "I will speak to Mrs. Hatch," he said briefly.

"That's decent of you, Roger. I won't get caught this way again."

But Manning was not listening. In his pleasant voice he was telling Mrs. Hatch that his wife had reconsidered and would speak according to arrangement that evening. Having finished, he turned to meet Sylvia's surprised and frightened eyes.

"What do you mean?" she gasped. "I never heard of such effrontery. I haven't done a thing to prepare for that talk. I know nothing about the subject and I care less."

Her plump face was working in an effort to restrain her tears.

"I have a couple of articles in the library that will help you out," Manning told her quietly. "I fancy that you can absorb enough between now and eight o'clock to get by with a crowd of suburban women."

"I won't do it."

"You'll have to, Sylvia. You can't, without appearing ridiculous, explain that this is a matter of discipline. Brookhurst would rock with mirth at that."

"I can't do it," whimpered Sylvia. But she followed him to the library.

She sank into a chair, her sullen eyes following him as he found the articles.

"Here you are," he said, drawing a chair to the table. "Do your best for the honor of the Mannings, Sylvia."

"I believe that I am naturally a tyrant," Manning grinned as he went out into the sunshine, for the temperamental April day had begun to smile. "I haven't felt so fit today."

His son and a rather untidy nurse were coming up the walk. "Hello, Peter!" he greeted.

"Hello, fardie!" It was a weary little voice and the eyes in the child's pale face were unspeakably bored.

Manning regarded his son in interested silence, the boy enduring the scrutiny indifferently. His hair was too thin; his soiled legs shot out of his soiled socks like spindles. If the conversation between the two women of the train could have been said to have left Manning's mind, it returned now.

"You may go, Mamie; I will take care of Master Peter till dinner time," he said to the delighted nurse.

Peter's eyes flew open, and putting his soiled fist confidingly into his father's hand, he trudged with him down to the lily pond and sat down on a bench.

"Had a good time today, son?" asked Manning.

"No, fardie. Mamie's too old to play with boys."

"Mother?"

"Mother's busy every afternoon there is. And mornings she's asleep."

"I—see. Not a very exhilerating life for a youngster, is it, Peter?"

"Huh?" Peter responded drowsily as his head dug deeper into his father's side. Presently he was asleep.

Manning, a protecting arm about his son, felt his anger rising. Was Sylvia too blind to see that Peter was untidy and under-nourished? Was he blind, also—needing the sting of gossip to clear his eyes?

Sylvia had been a sweet, attractive girl when he had married her. His sister, whose college classmate Sylvia was, had, however, frankly disapproved when Roger had told her of his betrothal.

"Roger, you poor infant!" she had exclaimed.

"Simply," Jean had said when pressed for an explanation, "that Sylvia doesn't go under her own power. At thirty she will be soft and slumpy."

He had reminded Jean that Sylvia did not lag in her class.

"Pride," she had explained briefly.

"And why should not pride keep her from becoming slumpy, as you call it, after she is married?"

"Don't ask me why it shouldn't, Roger. It doesn't, that's all. A lot of women believe that their job ends at the altar. Why don't you marry Betty Holt?"

"That doll-woman!" he had scoffed.

"Don't fool yourself, old man; Betty is all there when needed. Go ahead and marry Sylvia," she had finished, "only don't call on me to bring up the children."

Manning was thinking, there by the lily pond, that Jean had not been altogether wrong. The dinner gong interrupted his revery, he gathered up the sleeping Peter and went up to the house.

Sylvia emerged from the library as he entered. "Where is Mamie?" she asked, seeing Peter in his father's arms.

"Why did you permit him to go to sleep? It only means that he will be wakeful tonight."

"The little beggar is all tired out. Doesn't he have naps, Sylvia?"

"Please remember that he is four. I don't interfere in your affairs; if you will grant me the same indulgence——"

"I have. And I don't like the result. Have you no pride?"

Peter stirred and woke. "Peter's pritty hungry," he confessed as his father set him down.

"Fine! How about some bread and milk?"

"Bul-ly," replied Peter gravely.

But there was no milk. "It soured," the maid explained sullenly.

"Peter can have what we have, Roger," Sylvia protested. "A little of that roast pork won't hurt him at all. And there is ice cream."

"Bring him a soft-boiled egg, Delia," Manning said to the maid, and Delia slammed out of the room, muttering.

"Now see what you've done!" cried Sylvia. I can run this house, Roger. I am very angry about tonight, but I am going through with it, but keep your hands off the house, please, and the management of Peter. I can't stand everything."

Dinner was finished in silence, and Manning went up stairs with his son. At eight, hearing Sylvia go out, and Peter being asleep, he went over to see Doctor Mason.

"Doctor," he began abruptly after seating himself in the office, "what is the matter with Peter?"

The doctor gave Roger a cigar and lighted his own. "Peter has a delicate nervous organism," he said.

"Rot! I don't want side-stepping, Mason. Why has he those blue circles under his eyes? Why is he so susceptible to colds? Why is he so thin? In short, what is the matter with Peter?"

"You want the truth, Manning?"

"Straight from the shoulder, please."

"He doesn't have the proper food. He was eating meat and pastries when his chief diet should have been milk."

"Go on."

"The rules that I laid down have been unheeded. And it goes a bit deeper than that. Peter isn't happy. Nobody plays with him. His energies aren't directed. Mrs. Manning believes kindergartens to be unnecessary. A bored child, Manning, is a sad sight."

"Mason,"—abruptly—"what is the matter with the modern mother?"

"Nothing. There has never been a time when the business of child-rearing has been carried on so intelligently."

"Then the fault is—individual."

He went home through the soft star-lit night and sat down to wait for his wife. She came at length and as she passed the library door, he called to her gently.

She entered, obviously nervous and ill-pleased. Manning looked at her hair, falling untidily from beneath her hat; at her frock, expensive enough, heaven knew. His eye caught a spot on the chiffon panel and Sylvia clutched at it nervously.

"Well," she said sharply. "I am tired even if you are not. If you have finished your scrutiny, I will go up to bed."

He never remembered having felt so sad and defeated.

"Sit down, Sylvia," he began quietly; "I want to talk to you."

"You have talked quite enough for one day," she returned.

"Sit down," he said again.

With a petulant gesture she sank into a chair. "Please get it over quickly," she said flintily.

"Very well. Sylvia, I don't like the way this house is run."

"Then why don't you try running it yourself?" she retorted insolently.

"Because, as it happens, that isn't my job."

"Oh!"

"I might endure the house with all its freshness wiped out as though with a smutty hand; I might endure the unspeakable food; what I refuse to endure is seeing Peter dirty——"

She rose with a belated air of dignity. "Roger, you are simply outrageous. Do you think I am going silently to endure this tirade?"

"You are not to go yet, Sylvia; I am not through with you. I wish to impress upon you that from tonight you are to manage our house and our son so that we cease to be subjects for gossip."

"What do you mean by that?"

He told her unsparingly and she winced under his words.

"Hereafter I am to have something besides weak coffee and burned toast for breakfast," he went on. "Peter's food and his clothes are to be taken care of. For eight years I have left this end of the partnership to you and I am not satisfied. There must be a change."

"The alternative?" she queried icily.

"I take it for granted that you will try. If you fail, I assume that it will be through inability to grasp the essential details, and I shall install an efficiency expert in the house to teach you."

Sylvia laughed unpleasantly. "Isn't that what Betty Holt Farriday has become? Perhaps you mean her."

"Perhaps."

Sylvia's arrogance broke at that and she buried her face in her hands and sobbed unrestrainedly. "You b-brute," she cried. "To talk to me like this! Didn't you marry me?"

"It was a mutual contract, Sylvia."

"Just because I haven't kept young and slender, you treat me like this! Your wife! And the mother of your child!"

"Motherhood is too universal for you to presume on that, Sylvia. The mere fact that you bore Peter doesn't be-pedestal you, though I'd like it to."

She lifted her tear-drenched face. Tears were not becoming to Sylvia.

"Perhaps you wish you had not married me."

"Not yet, Sylvia."

"Perhaps you wish you had married Betty Holt." She held herself motionless, waiting for his reply.

"Not yet, Sylvia!"

With a smothered cry she left the library and went up to her room.

During the next few hours Sylvia lay on her bed, her wide eyes staring into the darkness. One by one the bitter accusations of her husband came back to her memory and she writhed under them. She had returned from the club that evening humiliated enough at her indifferent success, but that was nothing to the humiliation of knowing that she was the victim of censorious tongues.

And what if Roger should carry out his threat? If he should place Betty Farriday in her home to teach her the elements of home-making, she would never again be able to hold up her head in Brookhurst. And she knew Roger. With that look in his eyes she could not doubt his determination.

As a widow Betty was far more attractive than she had been as a girl. What if he should fall in love with her? She had come to Brookhurst to live and they were thrown together often. Men did those things—even men like Roger.

The thought set her heart beating violently. She had not disrobed, and she rose, and, switching on the lights on either side of her toilet table, she gazed long in her mirror.

She was not very attractive—she admitted that. Her frock was crushed and soiled. She would get some new ones. And a new corset—one of those armor-plate things that nearly kill you. And she would have her hair curled. And she would see that Mamie kept Peter neater. She was still angry with Roger, but she admitted that she owed him that much for, professionally, he was a rising man.

If she did all these things, his crossness would subside. He was overwrought now, that was what was the matter with him.

Fright and the stirring of a primitive jealousy had headed her toward a shoddy reform, but the fundamental fact of her disloyal incapacity never occurred to her. Satisfied, she went to bed and fell asleep.

She was awake long before the house was astir the next morning but pride kept her in her room till Roger had left. Then she rose and slipped on a bedraggled negligee and went down to the kitchen.

"Delia, what did you give Mr. Manning for breakfast?"

"Same's usual, Mrs. Manning."

"Eggs?"

"Master Peter et the last one last night."

"Why do you let provisions get so low, Delia?"

"Wan pair of hands can't do everything. If you ain't satisfied——"

"That will do, Delia. And Sylvia fled to the dining-room and sat down to cold toast and coffee.

"There isn't any use reforming myself out of a cook," she told herself.

A note from Roger lay beside her plate and she picked it up with misgivings. Her face cleared, however, as she read it. He had forgotten to mention last night that they were invited by the Brewsters to motor into town tonight to see The Underling. It was to be a party. He would be out early and he wanted to see Sylvia looking her best. He finished by reminding her that he had been very serious last night.

Sylvia overlooked the warning in her pleasure at the invitation. The Brewsters were very exclusive and had a beautiful place on the edge of Brookhurst. If Roger should be appointed counsel for the corporation Mr. Brewster headed, why, they were made.

Peter came in and she kissed him fondly. "Mother wants you to keep very neat after this, Peter," she said.

"I'd rather play," stated Peter plaintively.

"Mamie, you must play with Peter." And Mamie, looking rather sulky, took him by the hand and led him away.

In the determination to look attractive that evening, Sylvia called up the Brookhurst hairdresser.

"I think you had better do it up yourself," the woman, having shampooed and dried, said dubiously.

"Oh, no, Mrs. Ryan; I haven't done my hair a new way for ages. Then I'll have a facial, please: and my nails need attention."

At five Manning came in, Peter at his heels. "Fardie walked with a pritty lady," he told his mother happily.

"Only Betty," Manning answered Sylvia's unspoken question. "She is to be one of the Brewsters' party tonight."

Sylvia's heart sank as she went away to dress.

A little later she confronted him, her eyes rather wistfully searching his face.

"Sylvia!" he exclaimed. "What in the devil is the matter with your hair? Was it to preserve that intact that you wore that veil over it when I came in?"

"Mrs. Ryan did it," she faltered.

"Well, for heaven's sake, straighten it out, can't you? And Sylvia, that dress is a mass of wrinkles. Surely you have something else you can wear?"

"It's all I have that's decent," Sylvia returned, sudden tears gushing to her eyes.

"That is very far from decent. I should think you might have found time to press it today."

"I won't go," she said sobbingly.

"Don't be foolish. I only want you to look as well as the other women. It means a great deal to us, Sylvia."

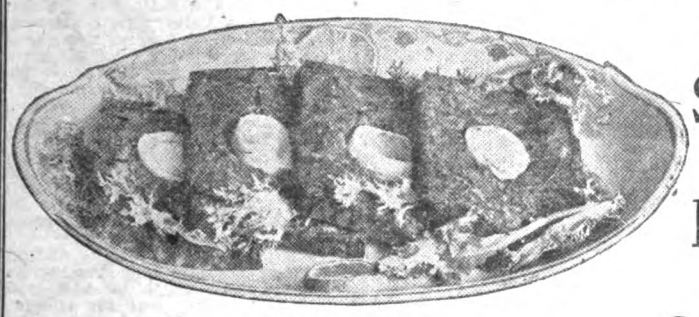
She was sobbing frankly now. "I am not going," she repeated. "You can tell them I am suddenly indisposed. It is true, too."

Manning regarded her in silence for a moment before seizing the telephone. "Mrs. Brewster," he said presently, "Mrs. Manning is not feeling up to going tonight. We are both very much disappointed."

Sylvia, her sobs hushed, was listening alertly.

"Yes, of course I will come if Mr. Brewster desires it. Good by."

"You are going without me?" There was an ominous calm in Sylvia's voice.



"I must. Brewster, it seems, wants a word with me before leaving for the coast at midnight. I must dress now."

Sylvia went into her room and, closing the connecting door, threw herself face downward on her bed. She heard dinner announced but she neither knew nor cared what her husband and her son had to eat. Roger knocked at her door but she refused to admit him. Presently she heard the murmur of the Brewsters' powerful motor: the pleasantly-pitched voices of the women floated to her ears—and they were gone.

Never in the course of her placid life had she been so shaken and frightened. Not for a moment had she thought that Roger would go without her? Was she losing him? Was this rupture

OLD-FASHIONED PICKLES AND OTHER SEASONABLE RECIPES

MEAT-HASH LOAF

By Violet Marsh

Varied Uses For the Food Chopper

AMONG the many modern kitchen utensils, no single one is of greater service than the food chopper. For years my chopper was only used for grinding meat; I did not appreciate its all-round usefulness. Now it has an established place in the kitchen and few days go by that I do not use it for some purpose. Grinding sausage meat, cold meats for scallops and hashes, Hamburg steak, and vegetables for soups, are only a few of the uses a chopper may be put to.

Peanut butter can be made at home with the chopper, using the finest plate and returning the peanuts to the chopper just so long as there are coarse pieces. Raw peanuts can be roasted in the oven if one is willing to keep stirring them so they will roast evenly. A large wire basket is the best receptacle for holding them as the heat will circulate evenly through the open sides.

Bread dried in pieces and ground as needed is more satisfactory than when prepared in advance, as it is liable to become oily tasting. If cranberries are ground before being made into sauce or pies, they will not require so long cooking and the skins seem to almost disappear. This also applies to apples that do not cook up readily. In chopping raisins for cake, roll them in one tablespoon of corn flour to each cup of raisins before putting into chopper and they will not be in such a solid mass. Horseradish, cabbage for cold-slaw, cocoanut, orange and lemon rinds, can be prepared with the food chopper.

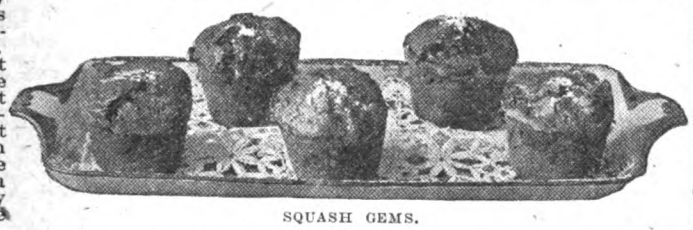
MACARONI WITH PEAS.

Be sure to use the right sized cutter. For instance, cabbage requires the coarse cutter, while cranberries are best cut with the finest. Rub the sides of the cutter very sparingly with butter before grinding sticky foods such as raisins or fresh orange peel. If the chopper slips, put a piece of coarse sandpaper under the table before screwing it to place. If it works hard, apply a little glycerine to the bearings. It is better than oil.

Other Cooking Helps

Dip the measuring cup into boiling water before filling with molasses, lard or butter, and less will be wasted.

Never let the cogs of your egg beater touch the dishwater, as it causes black specks, later on, to fall into the mixture you are beating. One drop of glycerine is sufficient to oil the beater.



In washing spinach and other greens, try a little salt in the water and observe how it helps remove the grit.

If you wish to keep a piece of cut cheese for any length of time, brush it over with hot paraffin.

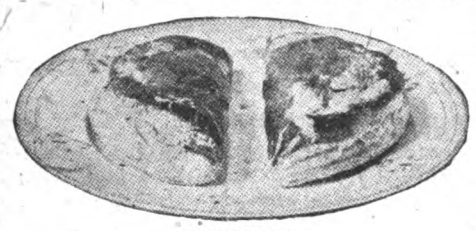
In handling drop biscuits or dumplings, dip the spoon each time into hot milk and the dough will not adhere to it. Hot water works nearly as well but the milk assists in giving the biscuits an even brown.

In preparing celery for the table, wash the leaves, and dry them for soups and stews during the winter.

When salt sticks to the shaker, do not mix with cornstarch, but when not in use, keep the shaker in a covered jelly glass in the kitchen.

SQUASH GEMS.

Insert tiny paper funnels into the cuts in the top crust in making berry pies to take care of the escaping steam. The juice will also boil up into these and prevent it from running out. If little scraps of pie crust are left over, cut them round and shape over the outside of round muffin-pans, bake and use for creamed fish or chicken.



Extend your peanut butter, and at the same time make it into a pleasing consistency by soaking one teaspoon of gelatine in two tablespoons of cold water and dissolving it in one cup of hot lightly salted milk, and working it into one half pound of peanut butter. Press into wet moulds to harden. Too much should not be prepared at once as it will not keep as long as pure peanut butter.

If peaches lack flavor, crack a few of the stones and add the kernels to the syrup while it is cooking. Do not put the kernels into the canned fruit as in time they will give out too much flavor. Two whole stones may be added to each can of fruit.

Cranberries and sweet apples make a delicious combination. Try vinegar that has been used over beets when making vegetable salad.

Canning Mixed Vegetables

Not even a spoonful of vegetables need be considered too small an amount to be worth canning, for some of the most tempting dishes in winter are made from canned mixed vegetables. The vegetable salad is one; soups and scallops are others. A good combination is young carrots, string beans, peas and young onions. Another is celery, green peppers, small lima beans and onions. Beets are best canned by themselves, as they will color the whole mixture. Fill sterilized jars with layers of raw vegetables as closely as possible, then to overflowing with boiling water. Put on rubbers and tops and half seal. Cook three hours in hot water bath with water just to shoulder of jars, or 35 minutes in steam-pressure cooker under 15 pounds pressure.

TURNOVERS.

CORN AND TOMATOES.—Scald tomatoes one minute, plunge into cold water and remove skin and core. Cut into quarters. In cutting corn from cob, cut a little more than half the kernel off, and then with a strong knife scrape the cob lengthways, pressing out the milk from the remaining part of the kernel. Fill jars, using two parts tomato to one part of corn. To each quart jar add two teaspoons of sugar.

CONCENTRATED SOUP.—An excellent soup can be made from any desired mixture of vegetables. A tasteful combination to can consists of one quart of concentrated tomato pulp (tomato boiled down until thick), one pint of corn, or tiny lima beans, one pint of okra, one teaspoon of salt and three teaspoons of sugar.

To make the tomato pulp, cook together three quarts of sliced tomato, one small chopped onion and one half cup of chopped sweet red pepper. Put through a sieve and remove seeds and skins. Return pulp to kettle and cook down to about the consistency of catsup. Measure, add the corn and beans and okra which has been prepared for canning with seasoning. Cook all together for ten minutes and then fill hot sterilized jars. In hot-bath method cook two hours, or 35 minutes under 15 pounds steam pressure.

Old-Fashioned Pickles

There is nothing better than the pickles our grandmothers used to make; modern cookery cannot improve upon those old-time recipes. Following are some favorites.

SWEET PICKLED ONIONS.—Slice large onions, or use the small button variety. Cover with a brine heavy enough to float an egg, and let stand 24 hours. Make a pickle to the proportion of four quarts of strong apple vinegar, five pounds of sugar, and one cup of mixed mustard and celery seed. Bring the pickle to a hard boil, and pour it over the onions which have been drained from the brine and placed in a stone crock.

PICKLED PEPPERS.—Use one half of large green peppers and the other half of the red and yellow sweet varieties. In the side of each, make a small incision through which the seeds may be removed without breaking the peppers. Cover the peppers with a brine sufficiently strong to float an egg and let them remain 24 hours. Drain and let stand 24 hours longer in a fresh brine. Wash in plenty of cold water. To every 24 peppers allow one quart each of strong vinegar and water and pour it boiling hot over the peppers. When cold, drain and cover with a boiling pickle made to the proportion of two quarts of strong apple vinegar, one sliced onion, two tablespoons of grated horseradish and about a teaspoon of whole cloves.

BEAN PICKLES.—Soak beans 48 hours in a brine strong enough to float an egg, and rinse in cold water and put into stone jar. Make a pickle of four quarts of strong apple vinegar, three cups of brown sugar, one root of horseradish, two ounces each of whole allspice and cloves, one ounce each of whole peppers and mace and three ounces each of black mustard seed, white mustard seed, stick cinnamon. Bring to a hard boil and pour over the beans. Put a large plate over the beans and weight it with a clean rock to keep them under the pickle. Keep jar covered.

CHILI SAUCE. Peel and chop fourteen large ripe tomatoes, two good-sized onions and three large green peppers and one red pepper. Make a pickle of three and one half cups of strong vinegar, three quarters of a cup of brown sugar, two tablespoons of salt, one tablespoon each of ground allspice and cinnamon, two teaspoons of celery seed, and half-a-cup of nasturtium seed. Cook one hour and bottle. Take care that it does not burn.

PICKLED CUCUMBERS.—Make a brine strong enough to float an egg, and into it put 175 small cucumbers as fast as they are gathered from the vines, leaving on a little of the stem and taking care not to bruise them. When ready to pickle, soak two days in fresh water, drain and wipe, and put into a firkin or crock and cover with boiling hot pickle made as follows: Use vinegar enough to cover cucumbers. Add one whole onion stuck full of cloves, two green peppers, a little ground horseradish root, a small bit of alum and a bag containing one and one half cups of mixed whole spice. Boil eight minutes.

TOMATO CATCHUP.—It is quite an art to make good catchup. Use red tomatoes that are thoroughly ripe. Cook as rapidly as possible, as long boiling has a tendency to darken the product. Use porcelain-lined kettle. Wash and cut up a quantity of tomatoes without removing the skins. It is not necessary to add water. Boil until soft and press through a fine sieve until only the seeds and skins remain. To each gallon of this liquid add three level tablespoons of salt and one-fourth tablespoon of red pepper. Return to kettle. For each gallon, allow two level tablespoons of whole allspice, four level tablespoons of whole white or yellow mustard seed, one level tablespoon of whole cloves two level tablespoons of whole celery seed, one ounce of stick cinnamon and three ounces of green ginger root. Put spices into bags. Add two large whole onions to the gallon. Stir frequently while the catchup cooks, as the tomato settles and will scorch easily. When the tomato has thickened, add two cups of vinegar and three level tablespoons of sugar to the gallon, and continue hard boiling until when a little is put in a plate the liquid will not run from it. Remove onions and spice and pour into hot sterilized bottles and cork tightly.

SQUASH PIE.—Cut the squash in several pieces, remove seeds, put into a cooker, or between two pans, and bake in the shell. Scoop out and

The Beast of Blossom Valley

PART II.

TINY realized he had spoken truthfully when he said he was almost famished, by the way he ate, but she was ready for him, and as soon as the bowl of cream tomato soup disappeared she bore the empty dish away only to return immediately and set before him a Spanish egg omelet garnished with green peas and parsley.

He felt tempted when she brought that in to ask her to eat with him—her pale face convinced him she needed the food more than he did—but personal pride forbade him follow the dictations of his heart. She understood how to plan a meal as well as serve it, he realized when a delicious cheese salad on chilled lettuce leaves followed the omelet to the table. Then came a surprise in the form of an individual pie and a cup of steaming coffee—coffee such as John Brunnett admitted to himself that only an expert could make. She was a puzzle—this new housekeeper was—but she had proved herself a first-class cook; he couldn't help it—he wanted another cup of that wonderful coffee, and there was nothing to do but ask for it; when it was finished he pressed the call button.

Immediately Tiny answered in person.

"You have proven beyond a doubt that you can cook," the man said more amiably than he had spoken before, "and as soon as you eat, you can go."

Tiny expressed her thanks by a polite bow that wholly upset the man; he wished she'd be impolite, if nothing else, but she wasn't—in fact, her manners were as perfect as any one he had ever known.

"Don't worry about washing the dishes tonight," he said pleasantly as his eyes rested on her flushed face, "you can do them tomorrow or the next day, or—or—oh, hell," he stammered, "I don't care when you clean 'em up, so long as you feed me such food as I've just eaten."

Tiny turned back towards the kitchen, her heart beating with joy. It was pleasant to be praised for well-rendered service, no matter what sort of work it was. She cleared off a corner of the cook-table for her own supper. Scarcely, however, had she finished the soup when the man whom she must look upon as a beast, because he had branded himself thusly in her eyes, made his appearance in the door.

Brunnette was a queer man—he had always lived according to his own ideas of custom.

"I say, young woman," he said abruptly, "I'm feeling in such spirits now that I'm going to drive in to town for a little while myself, and I'll take you in with me if you care to go."

Tiny creditably expressed her appreciation for such a kind favor, and 'ere long she was seated in a comfortable roadster, speeding along at the rate of thirty miles an hour, beside a man that she would have given much to have met under more favorable circumstances—she wished he hadn't told her he was considered a beast, for, aside from his gruff, blunt speeches, she had seen no beastly indications. But why should she worry? She had agreed to keep his house in order for a whole year's time for a certain sum of money—for that period at least she must remain only a servant in his sight.

Once on the way in he reached over and tucked the heavy rug closer about the little woman at his side, but not a word did Tiny utter until she asked him to let her out.

Purposely she chose the corner of Fifth and Jupiter—the fame of Jupiter was far-reaching for its reasonably-priced boarding houses. Regardless of the fact that she was getting out at Jupiter Street, John didn't open the door until she had promised to meet him at the same spot on the following morning.

Tiny watched him drive away until he was lost among the thickly-moving vehicles, then she fell in line with the usual Saturday evening crowd and made her way down town to one of the best department stores in the city. There she spent her whole week's salary and considerably more for an outfit such as she thought advisable to have for her present position.

There was much to be done, and Tiny found the night fairly spent before she crawled between the sheets of her small bed to snatch a few hours' sleep to dream of a place where rose-vines ran at will over an old stone archway.

At ten A. M. the next morning she reached the appointed place and though a bit ahead of time herself, she found the Beast of Blossom Valley waiting for her.

He greeted her pleasantly as he opened the door for her to get in, but made no further motion to assist her. She remembered it wasn't customary for a gentleman to assist his servant, in time to save herself embarrassment, and after carefully placing her bag on the running-board, she climbed in beside him.

It was a wonderful morning; the cold, crisp air was invigorating, and the sunshine against the ice-bordered pools along the road were as fairy palaces to the girl who had so long been denied them. Yet she managed to suppress the words of joy that rose to her lips as they spun along the winding road with only the chu-chug of the motor breaking the silence between them.

When they reached Blossom Valley Lodge again Brunnett immediately showed her to her room—a big, comfortable room it was, too—with windows on two sides, one overlooking the wooded vales, and the other afforded a view of the hills—the wonderful hills by which her decision of staying was based upon—a room such as she had dreamed of having only when success had crowned her efforts—she could scarcely believe it was hers to occupy as a servant; she wondered what the rest could be like. She gave a hurried glance towards the white tile bathroom as she slipped into a blue gingham house dress; tying on a white apron, she descended the stairs and straightway made for the kitchen.

"I started on the worst thing first," she remarked to Brunnett when he came in later on in the day.

"I see you did," he returned in a tone that expressed his surprise. "I never expected to see it clean again, and you're making great headway on those pots and pans, too; it already looks like a different place," he continued pleasantly, "and—and—I'm ashamed to say it, but I'm beginning to feel hungry again for another good feed."

The good feed was soon prepared, and the battle against dirt continued, and when night came down, regardless of the day being Sunday, Tiny had the kitchen shining like a new pin from floor to ceiling; she was reveling in the beauty her own hands had performed when Brunnett again made his appearance.

His keen eyes swiftly took in the room.

"It's wonderful, absolutely wonderful," he declared, "what soap and water and two willing hands can do."

Tiny's face beamed—he couldn't help but see it.

"But I didn't come in to rave over what I'm paying you to do," he added suddenly. "I came in to tell you I've been called to the city for a few days—probably a week, and I'm just wondering if you'd be afraid to stay on in the house during my absence."

"It's a big, old house," Tiny answered slowly, "but I will stay if you like."

The man looked his surprise.

"I didn't expect it of you hardly," he answered frankly, "but you're such an unusual type of a servant, I guess I might have expected it."

Tiny winced at the name—she wished he could pronounce it with less force, but no spoken words came to her lips.

"I'd appreciate it very much," the man continued presently, "and would also consider it a great favor if you'd stay on in my absence—but I warn you, the place is lonely. What about inviting a friend out to spend the nights with you?"

He saw a flush of red dye the pale cheeks of the girl before him, then presently she raised her eyes to his—such honest blue eyes as they were—they reminded the man of placid waters he had known.

"If you don't mind," she said timidly, "I'd prefer very much hiring a good, strong woman to help me set the place in order while you're gone; besides," she added softly, "you don't know what sort of people my friends might be."

It was the man's turn to blush. In all the days of his forty years he had never met such a woman as was his present housekeeper; he hadn't thought of such a thing as leaving a strange woman in his old home—he had expected her to leave when he told her he was going—but now—well, not even staying alone had seemed to effect her seriously. Suddenly it dawned upon him that staying in the house was a clause in the agreement she had signed; probably she had remembered that.

"You're sure," he said presently, "that you'd rather hire a helper and stay on in the house while I'm away, than run into town?"

"Positively sure, Mr. Brunnett," she said sweetly, "that is," she added softly, "if you are willing to trust me."

Something new and strange stirred within the man's soul. Could he trust her? Why, he felt like telling her outright he could trust her to the ends of the earth, but common sense reminded him that he had known her only since yesterday, and, worst of all—she was a servant in his house, not an acquaintance.

"I shall leave my house in your hands," he said, trying hard to effect his voice a bit into the gruffness that he found so hard to use when speaking to her.

"And I'll guard it with my very life," she interrupted.

Her speech startled him; instinct assured him she was speaking truthfully—how he wished she were a friend instead of a servant.

"I—I think you'll find a good helper in Andy's wife," the man returned. "I'll speak to her before I leave."

So it happened that while John Brunnett was fighting the Bulls and Bears in the stock exchange in the city, Tiny Thaxton, with the assistance of buxom Judy, was fighting the dust and dirt of two years' accumulation in the house at Blossom Valley.

At the end of the fifth day it fairly shone in cleanliness from the brass knocker on the front door to the hinges on the back.

Tiny had thrown the blinds open to the winter sunshine, and cleaned with her own hands the dainty lace curtains that covered the windows. Look where you would, not a speck of dust or dirt was to be found.

A note from the master of the house had informed her that he would be home some time Saturday afternoon—just what time he would make his appearance she had no idea—but in order to leave nothing undone that would surprise him, she had the fire lit in the big fireplace and from the much neglected conservatory she had found enough flowers to add color to the scene, and then she curled up in the same chair in which she had sat when she signed the agreement just a week ago to become housekeeper for the Beast of Blossom Valley. She was as fresh and sweet in her simple little house dress as the old aristocratic house looked in its cleanliness.

The week, though a very strenuous one, was already proving beneficial; that tired, numb feeling that had been her constant companion in Leeds' office was gone from her brain, and though physically tired, she was spiritually happy; she hoped the Beast of Blossom Valley would be pleased.

Suddenly the door opened, and the man of her thoughts came in. An exclamation of joy escaped his lips when he beheld the transformation.

"Home—thank God!—it looks like home again," he said fervently as he bowed his head among the flowers.

"I—I—hoped you would like it," a voice interrupted, and turning, he came face to face with the one who was responsible for his joy.

"Like it!" he exclaimed, catching her small hand in his in a clasp of tenderness. "Why, it's like coming home to come in and find everything sweet and clean and flowery—it only lacks mother's presence of being perfect."

"I'm sorry that's impossible," Tiny said sweetly.

Suddenly the man realized with embarrassment that he was still holding her hands, and quickly he released them.

Tiny noticed the movement, but joy instead of shame thrilled her heart.

She drew a chair near the fire, into which he immediately sank.

"Now," she said pleasantly, "while you rest I'll run in and fix you something good to eat."

"Isn't Judy here?" he asked anxiously.

"Yes," Tiny answered, "but it isn't necessary to keep her longer; the hard work is done and I—I—like the cooking as—as well as the lounging chairs."

His eyes rested upon her for an instant in astonishment.

"I'm sure of that," Brunnett answered slowly, "but I had as well tell you now that I learned today that my business is going to keep me pretty well on the jump this winter." He didn't tell her, however, that he had of his own free will arranged it so, nor that he felt afraid of living in his own home with the woman he had hired to look after it.) "Of course," he continued, "I'll be dropping in most every Saturday, and since I can't leave you alone in the house, I've been thinking that Judy might stay on, and help you out."

"But what would I do," Tiny asked, "if Judy remains?"

"You—you—well—you might darn up my socks and mend my clothes, and read to me when I come home, like—mother used to."

"Is that a cook's duty?" Tiny asked.

"I didn't hire you to cook," Brunnett answered, "unless it was necessary. You're my—my—housekeeper, and I want you to be presentable at all times to go to the front door."

Tiny was puzzled; she hadn't expected anything like this.

"Can you read and write creditably?" Brunnett queried.

"I think so," Tiny answered. "I've had a little experience."

"Well," the man replied thoughtfully, "in that case you can be a lot of help to me—you'll do my correspondence."

"I might be able to type your letters with a bit of practice," Tiny added. "I studied stenography once."

John Brunnett wrinkled his brow in deep study.

"You're some woman," he said slowly, "but that's your business—and if you'll help me with my correspondence over Sundays, we'll retain Judy by the month for that part of your service."

"You're very kind, Mr. Brunnett," Tiny said sweetly. "I'll run in and give Judy the order for dinner."

"Tell her," Brunnett called after the retreating figure, "to set the table for two."

As Tiny had proved her ability as a housekeeper, she proved her worth as a stenographer. John Brunnett marveled at the rapidity of her speed, the correctness of her English—but, try as he would, not a breath could he learn of her past—she had come like a ray of sunshine into his old home, and her presence had kept it sunny ever since.

The winter was like a long, sweet dream to the Beast of Blossom Valley; no matter where business called him, he was never too far away to get back home for Sunday, and though Tiny kept herself in readiness to receive his guests, not a soul came during the winter—and, oh, what a wonderful winter it had been, too! With Judy to do the housework, she had found plenty of time for keeping Brunnett's wardrobe in perfect condition, for daily walks in the woods, and at nights the old home would ring with the music of her happy voice; the trembling was gone from her fingers, her cheeks would rival the red of any June rose; her eyes twinkled like the stars on a dark night, and she was happy.

While every day Brunnett, in spite of himself, had to admit that the girl was growing dearer to him; time and time again he had tried to learn something about her, but his efforts had all been in vain, though he had made a house-to-house canvass on Jupiter Street trying to learn something of her past. But at last he gave up—what did it matter, anyway?—she was his servant.

As the winter was giving way to the spring, however, love overruled his selfish pride, and he admitted to himself that regardless of who or what she might have been, he loved her, and that night he started home to stay.

It was late afternoon when he reached Blossom Valley, and failing to find the little woman in the house, he went to the garden. Just as he expected, he found her prying among the flowers, but, to his astonishment, he plainly saw traces of tears in her eyes when she greeted him.

"You're—not becoming dissatisfied, Tiny?" he asked anxiously as his strong hand caught her weaker one in a vise-like grasp.

"Not dissatisfied," she answered, "but heart-sick."

For a moment the man stood as though stunned from a heavy blow.

"There are so many things on this place that needs the attention of a loving hand," the girl continued falteringly, "that I can't decide which one to attend to first."

In a flash the man's arms were around her. "Tiny darling," he said tenderly, "you have spoken the truth, but I—I—need you more than anything else—won't you come to me first?"

Tiny looked up into the eager face?"

"You know very little about me, John, to offer me such an honor."

"I've fought that out, Tiny dear," he answered. "I don't care who you are or what you did before you came to me—I only know you came, and that I love you—and I want you forever."

Tiny hid her face on Brunnett's broad shoulder. "I've known that for a long time," she said sweetly, "but I didn't know whether you'd ever find it out yourself or not; and as for my past—well, dear," she continued softly, "it was absolutely colorless until I found——" mash, and to each heaping cup of squash add one teaspoon of dry flour mixed with five tablespoons of brown sugar, half-a-teaspoon each of ground ginger, cinnamon, and salt, one fourth of a teaspoon of nutmeg, and one well-beaten egg. Stir thoroughly together and add one cup of boiling hot milk and about one tablespoon of butter. Beat well and pour into a deep pie plate lined with pastry made the same as for "turnovers." Bake in a very moderate oven until brown, which will take an hour or more. Slow cooking improves the flavor. If the pie boils, it will be spoiled.

"The Beast of Blossom Valley," Brunnett interrupted laughingly as their lips met.

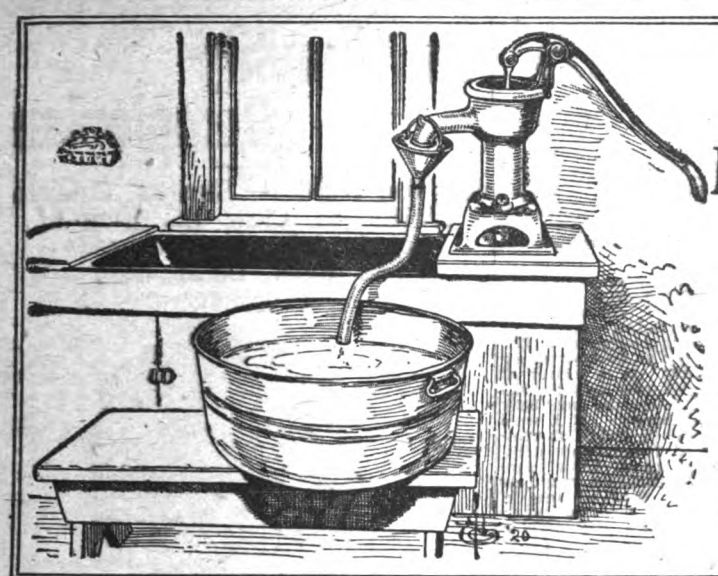
TURNOVERS.—Stir three fourths of a cup of lard until it is creamy, and slowly add one half cup of ice water, and one teaspoon of salt. Add enough pastry flour to make a stiff dough, working it in with two knives. Dust board with flour, turn out the dough and flour. Do not handle more than possible. Make into ball and roll to about a half-inch thickness, working from the center of ball each time, first from you and then toward you. Lift from board and turn over if the pastry sticks. Make into a roll and cut enough pastry from the end for each turnover. Roll into a circle, put filling onto one half, wet the edge with cold water so it will stick together, fold over and press edges together. Make several tiny incisions in the top for the steam to escape through. Brush over with milk or water.



APPLE AND RAISIN FILLING.—Chop two cups of apple with half-a-cup of raisins. Season with three teaspoons of melted butter, quarter of a teaspoon of cinnamon and eight tablespoons of sugar mixed with two rounding tablespoons of flour. Use more sugar if desired.

SQUASH GEMS.—Warm three-fourths cup of dry sifted squash, add one-fourth cup of brown sugar and beat until dissolved. Add one well-beaten egg, one tablespoon of warmed butter and one cup of thick sour milk. To one and one-half cup of sifted flour and one-half cup of fine cornmeal add two rounding teaspoons of baking powder and one scant half teaspoon of soda, and stir into mixture. Beat hard one minute and bake in a fairly hot oven until brown. Sprinkle tops with chopped nuts if desired.

MEAT HASH LOAF.—Put through the meat chopper one cup of raw lean beef, one half of an onion, two potatoes, one beet, two carrots, one small turnip and a stalk of celery. Use raw vegetables. Make a white sauce the same as given for "Macaroni and Peas," and stir through vegetables with one cup of bread-crumbs. Season with salt and pepper. Press into a deep tin, cover with beef fat or drippings and bake in a moderate oven about two hours. Serve hot, cut into thick slices. A thin slice of hard-boiled egg on each slice of loaf and salad green makes an attractive garnish.

MACARONI WITH PEAS.—One or two vegetables mixed with macaroni forms a very nutritious dish as well as "tasty." Drop the macaroni into boiling salted water and boil hard until soft. Plunge into cold water to prevent it becoming pasty. Mix with peas, mashed turnip, beets and carrots cut into cubes, or boiled cabbage. Season with butter, pepper and salt, or pour over a white sauce made as follows: Put two tablespoons of butter into a saucepan and when it bubbles slowly cream in one rounding tablespoon of dry flour. Slowly add one cup of hot milk, or equal parts of milk and water, and simmer five minutes. Season to taste.

THE MODERN WASH DAY

By Ella Gordon

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett Pub., Inc.

THE majority of housewives today are doing their own washing and ironing. It is a true saying that "it is not the wear but the care of clothing that determines how long it will last," and this is why more and more women have joined the ranks of those who would save by doing their own laundering. Naturally, the buying of materials that wear the best and save ironing has resulted in crepe, seersucker and knitted garments becoming very popular. After washing, they require only to be pulled into shape.

Importance of Proper Equipment

If portable tubs are used, there should be three of them. A wash-bench high enough to stand straight at the hips, with back bending just enough to procure a purchase on the clothes. Cultivate washing with the arms rather than with the back. It greatly lessens fatigue.

DOILIES SHOULD BE ROLLED BEFORE THEY ARE PUT AWAY.

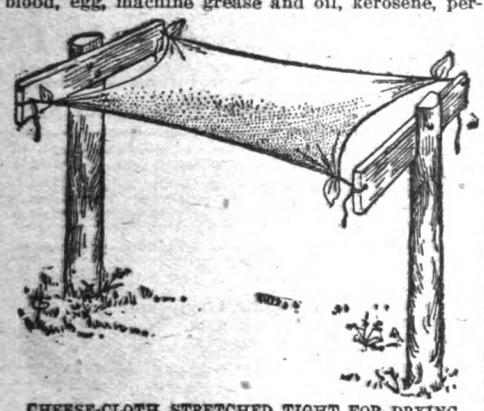
If a kitchen pump is used, insert a large tunnel into the end of a length of hose, fastening the tunnel to the head of pump so it will come under the spout. (See illustration.) Fill tubs by putting the other end of hose into the tub and pumping water into the tunnel. If you have running water in the house conducted through pipes with faucet fittings, connect hose with the faucet. Do not unnecessarily lift water. If one has a perfectly clean sink, it can be used to rinse clothes in by cutting a large circle from the side of a discarded hot-water bottle, placing it over the sink drain and putting an inverted saucer over it. The suction will hold it in place.



Use a washing machine if possible. The wear it saves the clothes will soon pay for it, to say nothing of the backaches it prevents. Use a wringer. Twisting clothes is destructive, besides the wringer presses out much dirty water that the hands cannot do. Keep the wringer oiled and cleaned. The rubber rollers will last much longer if the thumbscrews are loosened when wringer is not being used. Select a smooth, well-made washboard. Glass ones are the best. Wash and dry after using. Extend the life of your boiler by always washing and drying and hanging where it will not rust. Use a smooth wooden clothes stick.

How to Wash Clothes

The way clothes are washed has very much changed in the last few years. And with many, wash day has also changed. The clothes used always be put in soak Sunday night to be washed on Monday. There is a very logical reason for changing wash day to Tuesday, for Monday is the day when most housewives find the larder rather scant of cooked food, as little cooking is done on Sunday. So why not take Monday to get the house put to rights and a little cooking ahead before the big job of doing a washing is commenced? It makes the whole work easier.

Cold water combined with soap is a far better dirt solvent than hot. Stains common to the family wash are set by hot water and then must be rubbed out. The first step toward putting out a satisfactory washing, is to remove all fresh stains from the clothes. These include fruit and blood stains. Every household should boast of a full set of stain removers. They cost very little, last a long time, save work and the annoyance that the sight of a stained article always causes.

Cold water first, then soap will remove such stains as milk, cream and cocoa, meat juices, blood, egg, machine grease and oil, kerosene, perspiration and water marks. Grass, stove polish, shoe blacking and slight mildew will, when fresh, generally yield to cold water. If set, use denatured alcohol or Javelle water. Tea, coffee and berry stains are removed with boiling water. Ammonia, followed by a thorough rinsing in boiling water, will usually remove acid stains. Diluted, it can be used on colors and delicate fabrics. Iron rust and ink stains, if not too old, can be removed with citric or tartaric acid solution. Rinse immediately. Old blood stains and heavy mildew is removed by sprinkling with chloride of lime and moistening with vinegar or very sour milk. Rinse as soon as the stains disappear else the fabric will be weakened.

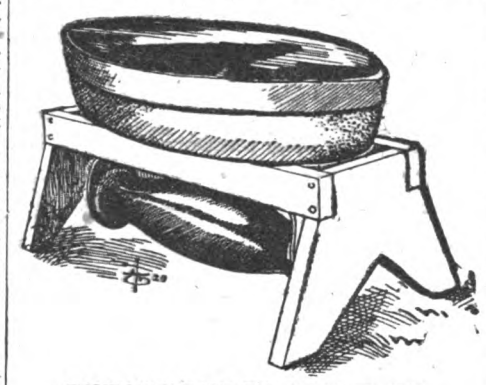
JAVELLE WATER.—One half pound chloride of lime dissolved in two quarts of cold water. One pound of washing soda dissolved in one quart of boiling water. Pour the clear liquid from the chloride of lime into the soda solution. Let the mixture settle and then strain the liquid through a cloth into bottles. Cork and keep in dark place.

A Simple Washing Process

One of the modern ways of washing is by the cold-pack process. Soak the clothes a few minutes in cold water. Press the clothes and drain off the water. Take each piece separately and rub over with soap jelly made by cutting into shavings a bar of soap and dissolving it in boiling water. After soaping, fold each piece and lay into second tub. The clothes can stand over night, but two hours is sufficient to start the dirt. Add fairly hot water and wash. Put into boiler with a little fresh soap, and after boiling commences, boil five minutes. Rinse through two or more waters, the last slightly blued.



The Cause of "Gray" Clothes

There are many who put twice as much labor as necessary into washing, yet have "gray" clothes. The reason is simple. Strong bleaching powders are very difficult to rinse out, and are seldom necessary. If not thoroughly rinsed out in very hot water, after a few washings the clothes will be gray. Bluing grays clothes that are improperly rinsed. A hot iron also turns clothes dark that are not thoroughly rinsed. Hard water that has been softened should be strained before the clothes are put in, as the sediment is quite likely to give the clothes a dingy appearance.

Colored Clothes and Woolens

The washing of colored clothes is very simple. Use only fresh lukewarm water. Boiler suds is unfit and will cause fading. Cotton will stand more misuse than any other material, hence it is an ideal fabric for school wear. Carefully rinsed in lukewarm water slighted salted, dried in the shade, and ironed with irons not over-hot, it will wear and retain its color several seasons.

Woolens claim very different treatment. Washing in too hot or too cold water, rubbing strong yellow soap into the garments, hard rubbing and putting through a wringer are the usual mistakes which cause wool to "felt," and become gray.

Use only soft, tepid water, and enough wool or other white soap to make a suds. One tablespoon of ammonia to each pail of water is harmless and acts as a dirt solvent. Before putting woolen garments or blankets into the water, brush and shake out the loose lint. Soak about forty-five minutes. Wash by squeezing and working in and out the water. A hand washer or washing machine makes the work easy. Squeeze out the water and put into a second suds containing about one third as much soap and ammonia. After being put through the suds, rinse in clean tepid water. Squeeze by hand and dry in the open air. It is always well to put off washing wools until the day is bright and windy.

Drying and Ironing

In these busy days any housewife has a right to put away "rough-dried" many garments and household articles. Everyday sheets should be evenly hung to dry, folded smoothly and put away without ironing. This also applies to cup towels, other coarse towels, all crepe and seersucker undergarments, men's stockings, etc. Make the ironing of skirts and dresses easy by always hanging to dry on a straight of the cloth. If hung by a gored seam, or a bias grain of the cloth, the garment will be out of shape and require much pulling into shape, if it can be done at all.

Doilies, centerpieces and round articles are ironed by doing the centers first, the edges by always working the iron from the center across the edges. If the outer edges are done first in a round-and-round fashion, they will likely stretch and give a bulging appearance to the centers. Roll them on a table, or over a roll of stiff paper, as illustrated, after they are wound.

Every housewife is entitled to a good ironing board and a skirt board. They greatly lessen labor and are always ready for use. Use a fair amount of padding. An old blanket folded once, or in three thicknesses, is about right, but at first may seem thick. Too much padding prevents smoothness and quick drying, and too little will not show the fabrics to advantage. Iron linen and starched things dry.

Special Cleaning

In almost every house there are soiled garments and furnishings which cannot be washed in the usual way and which hardly seem worth the expense of cleaning by a professional. Hair ribbons, velvets, old curtains, etc., are among the our big spreading maple tree and talk and talk. Yes, I love cats, too.

Fair Locks, let me say that farm life is no rosy dream. It takes hard work to produce those golden fields of grain but let your heart decide, only don't mistake pity for love.

Molly-Joe, I'd like to talk with you and I'd love to go camping with Pearl Vesey and her kiddies.

Mrs. W. D. Ford, your girlie is sweet. What is her name?

Mrs. Wilkinson, would you like to spend the day with me? We'd pick strawberries, go fishing and maybe wade in the creek. Yes, and you could swing in my hammock or lawnswing. We have plenty of shade and will have lunch under the trees and you can have all the cream you want for your strawberries.

Oodles of love to all.

MERRY ROMPING PEGGY.

Peggy.—Isn't it too bad that people will refuse their share of life's sunshine when they would be so much happier if they'd only feel like this:

"Good morning, Brother Sunshine,
Good morning, Sister Song,
I beg your humble pardon
If you've waited very long.
I thought I heard you rapping,
To shut you out were sin,
My heart is standing open
Won't you walk—right—in?"

Thanks, Peggy, for the strawberries and cream and the good time promised me but are you sure the sisters wouldn't see us if we went wading? That isn't the most dignified conduct for a person of my years, you must remember.—Ed.

ALBERTVILLE, ALA.

DEAR FRIENDS:

I read with interest the many letters that appear in each issue of COMFORT. Some of them are so cheerful you feel just like a spring day after reading them, while others give you the "indigoes" and you feel just like a rainy day on the Fourth of July. I disagree with some of the sisters in pouring out their burdens of sorrow to the whole world. Why, I never worry my door-neighbors with any of my little petty troubles, much less faraway friends. A lady, once remarked: "You look as though you never had a care in your life." I have had, but why should I worry her with an open confession of all my little trials and tribulations. They have been but trifles, and if I can keep them buried in my heart out of sight from the world I'm sure it will take something more than a "busy neighbor" with her spade-like tongue to ever dig them out. I notice some of the sisters give remedies and recipes. I shall give the following remedy for the benefit of KNOCKERS:

Hide your little hammer and try to speak well of others, no matter how small you may really know yourself to be. When a stranger drops in, jolly him. Tell him this is the greatest town or community on earth—and it is.

Don't discourage him by speaking ill of your neighbors.

There's no end of fun minding your own business. It makes other people like you. Nobody gets stuck on a knocker.

I was married several years ago to an exceptionally good man. We have built us an "ideal home." The foundation is made of very substantial material—LOVE. It is bounded by four sides, KINDNESS, FAITHFULNESS, HELPFULNESS and CHEERFULNESS. It is covered with heavy roofing of SUNSHINE. Trust all you sisters and brothers have a home like ours, but if you do not, let me insist that you begin at once working together to repair the one you have.

Pearl Vesey, I like your cheerful letters and your

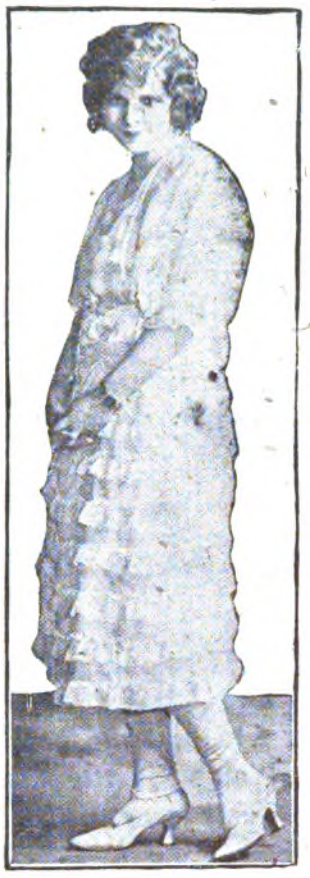
The Pretty Girls' Club



Conducted by Katherine Booth

The Little Things

SHE had on the prettiest dress in the room; her face was lovely, her manner charming, yet she failed to attract. Why? Ah, that's the moral I want to point out to my Pretty Girls this month. She just missed attraction by carelessness in the little things. You should have seen her stockings, my dears! Nobody could lay claim to being the belle of the occasion with ankles which looked like hers.

Oh, the stockings themselves were innocent enough, but the manner in which they draped themselves around her ankles would cure any observer of the admiration he had started to experience. For they were wrinkled in folds.

Now, there is no excuse for little lapses of the toilet like this. They simply mean that one is careless and not exactly nice about one's self.

A TOILET SPOILED BY WRINKLED STOCKINGS AND A CARELESS WAY OF STANDING.

And who can admire a girl who is not punctillous about her toilet?

"But," I hear some of my girls exclaim, "perhaps her stockings were too long in the leg and just wouldn't stretch smooth." There isn't any "just wouldn't" about matters of the toilet. It is up to the dainty young woman to see that defects of this kind are taken care of—and every such defect can be taken of, girls.

A good way to prevent wrinkled stockings is to wear two pairs of garters—or, rather, to wear side garters (which may be more than one pair, and probably are if they are attached to one's corset as they should be) and round garters as well.

Round garters should not be worn above the knee, where they impede the circulation, but below the knee. Side garters of proper length, attached to the corset in front, at the side and at the back (making three pairs of garters all together), will keep the stockings firm and smooth without the aid of the round garter, but the latter is an additional precaution besides being an attractive feature of one's toilet. The very last and tiniest wrinkle can be smoothed up and out of the leg of the stocking with the aid of the round garter.

Of course one may be very gay indeed as to one's round garters—they may be of shirred satin ribbon over elastic, or they may be of very narrow black elastic fastened with a rhinestone buckle, or they may be of black velvet, shirred, and fastened with a pink satin rose. Indeed, one may be as decorative as one desires. But, after all, the main point is that with them the stockings may be kept smooth and the ankles as trim and neat and dainty as possible. I hope all my girls will make up their minds to cast a last careful glance over their toilets before they leave their rooms, each time, and be sure that there are no wrinkled stockings, gaping hooks and eyes, frayed hems, or other shortcomings left unattended to.

I have told you before, and I repeat again, the girl who pays attention to all the little niceties that mark her as a dainty young woman has an attraction which beauty alone can never compete with; and a careful toilet makes up for many a flaw of feature and figure. Don't forget!

Answers to Questions

MARY A.—Oh, my dear, imagine anybody asking how to develop the hips! If you could only know the hundreds of women who are pining to reduce theirs! If I were you, I would let mine alone; they will, no doubt, put on flesh without any special aid, in time, and in any case slim hips are much to be desired these days. As a matter of correct measurement, however, your hips should be the same size as your bust, and your waist should be ten inches smaller. If your hips are thin, I should judge that your entire body is below the proper weight. You should eat fat-producing foods and chew every mouthful carefully before swallowing. The foods which put fat on thin hips are potatoes with butter, white bread and butter, rice, cereals with cream and sugar, macaroni, butter on your food, fat meats, gravies, sweet things. But, remember, that to produce fat, they must be digested properly. To take food which the stomach does not digest doesn't produce anything but indigestion and dyspepsia. So chew your food thoroughly, eat plenty of it, drink between meals, and watch your weight and your general condition. Drink plenty of milk. Exercise—for which you ask—will not put flesh on your hips, except indirectly. That is, it will stimulate the bodily functions and produce a more healthy condition, and from this may come added flesh, but it will not add flesh to your hips, and that is what you need. So make up your mind to eat to gain; to exercise to spur the body to do its work properly; to rest eight or nine hours out of every twenty-four. And you will soon find your hips filling out. As to clipping the hair every three or four months, I do not recommend it. If you have the patience to clip your hair, one hair at a time when it has a split end, that is perfectly sensible, but you should clip just above the split. To clip wholesale—that is, an inch or so off the ends of all the hair—shortens the hair and is seldom necessary.

MISSISSIPPI.—You did not tell me your weight, your height and other measurements, so I have no way of telling how much overweight you are and of advising you intelligently. I may say generally that the best way to reduce—in fact, the only way—is through regulating the diet. You must cut out the foods which make fat, and eat only those which give strength without producing fat. This means no potatoes, rice, sugar, macaroni, white bread, butter, cream, milk, candy, sweet desserts, fat meats, gravies, etc. But this leaves you plenty to eat. There is a book called "Eat and Grow Thin" which you would do well to read. Any book store can order it for you. Exercise active enough to make you perspire freely is also another excellent method of reducing, but must be helped out by the proper diet. There have been many answers given by me within the last three months to people who wanted to reduce, wherein I have planned out meals and given exercises. Practice any kind of exercise that you have found or may find in these columns, and be conscientious about adhering to the diet rules given. Then you will find yourself beginning to reduce.

PEARL.—I gave a freckle formula last month, also some advice about summer and winter freckles. Follow that advice, my dear. In regard to freckles, prevention is better than cure, and if you are careful next spring about your complexion, I think you will find the old freckles wearing away. You weigh enough for your age, and are a very good height. Later on, you will add ten or fifteen pounds, but it would be too much now.

AGNES.—You do not weigh any too much for your height, but if you would feel better to weigh somewhat less, note what I say to "Missssippi." However, there is one thing that you want to remember, and that is that a girl of fourteen needs lots of nourishment. Her body is undergoing changes and has to be kept strong and well-nourished to do its work. As a matter of fact, it is probable that the reason your hair is falling out and splitting at the ends is because your body is not furnishing it enough nourishment. If I were you, I would not attempt to reduce in weight at present, but would eat good healthful foods, drink milk, eat white bread and butter, lean meats, green vegetables and fresh fruits. As to the dandruff, your hair needs shampooing more frequently. Wash it once in three weeks, dissolving the soap you mean to use in hot water and pouring this liquid over your scalp a little at a time while you rub the scalp and lather the hair. Do not use a strong soap, as it cuts the skin and causes dandruff—which is nothing more or less than flaking skin. The white household soap will do, and you can shave it into the boiling water, letting it stand after it has been thoroughly dissolved, until you are ready to use it. Rinse the hair very carefully many times, for if you leave soap on the scalp or in the hair it will cause dandruff also. Brush the hair gently—not with strong, hard strokes—every night for forty or fifty times at the very least; and let it hang loose when you retire. In hot weather, it is a good idea to take the hair down during the day and let it air for ten minutes or so, especially if the scalp perspires. Massaging the scalp at night will stimulate it to healthy action. You no doubt read the directions last month or the month before in this department.

OKLAHOMA.—Yes, the milk diet means sweet milk. To gain by this method, you must drop solid food. For the first week, you are allowed an evening meal of simple, nourishing food, but after the first week no solid food at all. Each night put to soak half-a-dozen prunes in a tumbler of warm water. In the morning drink the prune juice, and eat the prunes, masticating them thoroughly before swallowing. Do this immediately on rising. If you rise at 7.00, take a tumbler of hot water at 7.20, and at 7.30 begin your milk, taking a glass and a half. Do not gulp this down, but drink it slowly, "chewing" each mouthful before swallowing. Take a glass and a half every hour until 3.30. Eat your supper at 6.00 or 6.30, then between that hour and going to bed drink two glasses of hot water. The second week, drink two glasses of milk each hour from 7.30 A. M. until and including 6.30 P. M. Take your prunes on rising and your glass of hot water as directed. Remember, you eat no food at all after the first week. The milk you are taking contains more nourishment than any amount of solid food you could possibly eat. Weigh on the afternoon of the first week, and weekly thereafter on the afternoon of the last day. You should gain from one to three or four pounds per week.

BROWN-EYED MARY.—Well, well, my girl with the changeable hair. I am sure I do not know what causes this, unless a difference in brushing. Although it is also possible that it is a "dusty color after shampooing, a "soft brown" as the oil gets spread out upon the hair once more from brushing, and "almost black" as it grows more and more oily between shampoos. The dandruff indicates that you are using too strong a soap in shampooing, too stiff a brush in brushing—thus irritating the scalp—or that you do not rinse the hair thoroughly at the time of shampooing. That is, any one of these three simple things might cause dandruff, as well as a general bodily condition. Before your next shampoo, oil the scalp at night—using a medicine-dropper and running it along a part from forehead to nape of neck, then along another part, and so on. Let the oil stay on all night, with the head tied up in a towel. Then in the morning shampoo thoroughly. Afterward, be sure that you brush the hair gently, and that your brush is not stiff. Of course, you never use a fine comb on the scalp, do you? This would break the skin and cause dandruff. Try massaging the scalp at night. About the occasional pimple on the face, you are quite right in thinking I will say it is from "your blood." Because that's where all pimples come from, except those which are caused by a blackhead festering. I wouldn't be surprised if yours are blackhead pimples, and get sore in trying to discharge their contents. You might try steaming the face when one of these appears—see my answer to "Mabel," although the best plan is to watch carefully and see that no blackheads form. I am glad you are so careful about your bodily habits. Do you drink six to eight glasses of water every day? Success to you!

HOPELESS.—Oh, indeed, my dear, you are not at all a "hopeless case." I should say that your whole trouble came from not nourishing your body sufficiently. You ought to weigh 115 or 120 pounds, and if you will build yourself up to that weight, I think you will find that your skin will whiten out of its own accord. At present you are not giving it the ingredients which make a fair skin. Do you see? You must regard yourself as a sacred trust. I know most women who are as busy as you are around the house get to feeling that anything will do for them to eat. But that isn't so! Read what I have said about foods, to the other people this month, and follow the suggestions. Remember, fruits and vegetables are the best kind of medicines, but that you need milk, meat, fish, poultry, bread and butter, eggs, to build up your strength. You must eat three good hearty meals a day, with no fried foods, cut out coffee and tea altogether (either of them, taken frequently, could give you that tan skin), drink plenty of water between meals, and see that your bowels move freely at least once a day. As to the hands which we want to whiten, I will give you a formula for a whitening lotion, but the thing you must do is to take as much care of them as possible in doing your work. If you would buy a pair of "house-gloves"—canvas gloves such as one uses in gardening—and wear them when sweeping, scrubbing, dusting, etc., it would make a great difference. Then if you will use a dish-mop in washing your dishes—and it is perfectly practicable, with plenty of good hot water—your hands will not suffer from this part of the work. Be careful about putting your hands first in hot water, then in cold, or putting them in hot water and then going into cold air. A little corn-meal in a covered bowl, kept on the shelf above the dishpan, and some of it rubbed on the hands to help dry them after wiping with a towel, is good for the hands. Bran water—water in which bran has been boiled, is softening. And of course, if you can get rain-water for your dishwashing and your toilet, it will help matters very much. Here is a good hand lotion:

For the Hands

One ounce glycerine, three ounces of rosewater, ten drops of lemon juice.

Or you can use just glycerine and lemon juice.

Another Hand Lotion

Glycerine, one ounce; lemon juice, one ounce.

To Beautify Complexion

All You Need is Stuart's Calcium Wafers to Clear the Skin of Pimples, Rash, Blackheads and Such Local Skin Eruptions

The calcium sulfide in Stuart's Calcium Wafers is nature's contribution to skin health. It is the substance that seeks the skin, assists in its activity to prevent stagnant pores, to stimulate circulation and divert impurities from finding lodgment in the skin texture. It sweeps its way through the bowels, removing wastes that otherwise may be absorbed into the circulation and thus try to escape through the skin. Use these wafers regularly for a few days and notice how the skin clears, how pimples, blackheads and such kinds of skin eruption are removed. They simply cannot remain. Their redness and itching disappear. Proper food and Stuart's Calcium Wafers will surely take the place of all your creams and lotions and you won't need your powder puff. Get a 60-cent box of Stuart's Calcium Wafers today at any drug store and join the ever-growing throng of American complexion beauties.

THERE are many and varied opportunities for an ambitious woman to earn money at home if she will do that thing at which she is most skillful. Assuming that many of our friends have been aided in becoming efficient cooks by lessons taught in COMFORT'S cooking department, let us talk about the money-making possibilities in providing box lunches for travelers who tour the country by train or automobile.

In view of the fact that dining-car and restaurant lunches at the present time are very costly and too often of a doubtful quality, their patronage is therefore avoided by many travelers who prefer the box lunches, which can be bought at places or stations along the road, and consequently the catering to this demand has become a growing business.

The Station Lunch

Thousands of people are traveling frequently over the same road, through thickly or sparsely settled localities, and when once they discover where they are sure to find a substantial and palatable box lunch, they will wait until they get to that place. Then there will be those who buy because they see others who seem to know it is a "good thing"; and, besides, people must eat.

Is There a Profit?

Taking into consideration the difference between the cost of raw material and a plate of food served in any public eating place, I will answer that there is. At home, there are no added overhead expenses by way of rentals or service. These are large items to the public caterer and the consumer must pay them.

In setting the price for any food, there must be an accurate reckoning of cost of all the ingredients used. Also figure the time of preparation, and allow yourself so much per hour. The expense of fuel is an item, as well. If supplies raised at home are available, such as milk, eggs, butter, jellies, nuts, etc., reckon these at the market price. There is an ample variety of food for box lunches on which a substantial profit may be realized, so do not make anything that does not pay.

Collapsible pasteboard boxes, waxed paper and paper napkins will be necessary, and if used in quantity any dealer will be glad to make a special price.

Contents of the Box Lunch

If you would gain a reputation for putting together satisfactory lunches, the contents cannot be chosen "hit or miss." Instead, study what will constitute a lunch that is digestible, appetizing and not too much sweet. The sandwich plays an important part in the lunch because it is easily managed and the endless variety includes those that are almost a meal in themselves. Avoid anything that soaks through, or will not hold its original condition until eaten as it might "turn" one against the entire lunch. Use some fruit, either dried or fresh, in every box. It is very refreshing to the traveler.

Neatness is half the battle in putting the lunch together. If, on opening the box, the general appearance is that of cleanliness and forethought, you have created a desire for the food that a slovenly, careless appearance would entirely dispel. One woman who did a box lunch business also grew flowers, and she managed always to tuck one into the box between packages where it would be the first thing to catch the eye. It was like a cheerful greeting. Kept in water over night, a flower will retain its freshness for hours.

Assuming that the lunch boxes will be sold from large baskets carried on the arm, it will be necessary to have four or more persons to handle them; one at each end of train working toward the center of train when it stops, and two at the center working in opposite directions. This, of course, applies to a fairly long train, while shorter ones can be handled by two working from each end.

Quick handling of boxes with no unnecessary words must be insisted upon if the boxes are to be disposed of, for most train stops are short. In fixing the price of lunch, make it even money so that making change can be rapidly done. Have ample change in an open pocket. In some instances, one selling lunches is allowed to board trains, but usually one must rely on being seen in a conspicuous position as the train pulls in and the passengers stepping onto the platform to make the purchase. With alertness the watchword, the quick-minded one will soon learn how to make sales.

A Wayside Luncheon Booth

In all directions throughout the country many women have developed a paying business by catering to automobilists who pass through their locality. This is usually done by some sort of a display that attracts the attention of the passerby.

The one here illustrated is the most unique I know of. A booth was built close to the roadside, just large enough for a counter across the front opening and shelves in back to hold the boxes of food. Displayed were soft drinks, milk, fruit, candy and cooked food neatly wrapped in paraffin papers. The crowning feature of the whole arrangement was the ringing of a large overhead bell just as each automobile came within hearing distance. The unexpected sound of the bell attracted attention, and in most instances would cause the driver to sufficiently slow down to find out what it was all about, with the result that if refreshments were in order they were quite likely to be bought then and there, as the novelty of the bell created a friendly interest in the booth.

The School Lunch

Let us depart a moment from the traveler's lunch to say a word about the school lunch which so many mothers are putting up every morning. In all sympathy, let me say that I appreciate the monotony of the daily lunch basket; but it is monotonous as well for the one who day after day must eat cold food. I am hoping that this article will help hundreds who put up school lunches as well as the woman who is searching for some way to make money.

Don't let the school lunch be merely something that will fill the lunch box in the morning and be only a "stay" for the child's appetite from noon until night. Make it a real contribution to the food which the children require to meet the needs of their growing bodies and active brains; to satisfy their appetite and keep them in health.

Remember, the cure for monotony is to be master of your job.

Box Lunch Recipes

Sandwiches

Cut the bread evenly with a sharp knife kept for the purpose. Do not cut it too thick; three eighths of an inch is about right. Trim off any hard crust without cutting into the soft bread. wrap each sandwich in paraffin paper. Long tins can be bought purposely for the sandwich loaf which is long and square. These will be found economical as little trimming, if any, is necessary.

WHITE COMPRESSED YEAST BREAD.—Pour one pint of hot sweet milk over one tablespoon of good lard, and one teaspoon each of salt and sugar. Do not allow milk to more than scald, as boiled milk will not make as good bread. Cool to lukewarm and then add three quarters of a yeast-cake that has dissolved in one half cup of lukewarm water. Stir in four cups of bread flour and beat until smooth and full of air. Set to rise by putting the mixing bowl, covered closely, in a pan of hot water about the temperature the hand can be comfortably held in, changing the water as it cools. During the entire process the dough should be kept in a warm place sheltered from drafts. In about an hour, beat the mixture again and add the remainder of flour. An excellent test as to amount of flour is to have the dough keep a round shape when you stop stirring. If the dough flattens, stir in more flour. Cut through and through and stir in the bowl, then cover again and rise to double its bulk. Turn onto a floured board and with as little handling as possible shape into loaves that will not quite fill the pans half full. Rise nearly to double its size and bake one hour. The fire must be under control so that a fairly hot oven may be maintained during the first half hour, and slowly decreased the last half. Place baked loaves where the air will circulate freely around them but not in a draft. Cake coolers are excellent for this purpose. Bread for sandwiches is best one day old. Where any considerable amount of bread is made, a bread mixer is a saving investment.

RAISED NUT BREAD.—Scald one pint of milk. Add one third cup of molasses and two scant teaspoons of salt. When cold, stir in two thirds of a yeast-cake dissolved in four tablespoons of lukewarm water. Use entire wheat flour, and proceed the same as in above recipe for white bread, working in one cup of chopped walnut or pecan nuts after the second rising in bowl.

YEAST BISCUITS.—Use White Compressed Yeast Bread recipe. Make into flat, round biscuits and bake in a quick oven until brown. Instead of making a sandwich, carefully cut out the top, not the sides, pull out the soft center and fill, then replace top.

Sandwich Fillings

BEEF TONGUE.—With a vegetable brush wash a perfectly fresh beef tongue through three waters. Cover with boiling water and simmer twelve minutes to the pound, adding plenty salt after it is about half cooked. When cold, skin and cut into thin slices. Use between well buttered slices of white bread.

PRESSED FOWL.—Dress, disjoint and half cover with boiling water. Cover tightly and slowly simmer until meat is tender and cleaves from the bones, turning occasionally so each piece will come under the liquor. Add a little salt one hour before done. Remove every bit of meat free from bones, gristle and skin. Chop fine and season with salt and pepper, and add one quarter the amount of boiled rice. When thoroughly mixed, pour over the liquor the fowl was cooked in which should be just enough to soften. Press into bread tin, cover with a thin board a very little smaller than the tin and put on a heavy weight. Keep cold and use the following day. Cut in thin slices.

BOILED HAM.—Soak over night in cold water if very salt. Scrub well and trim off any black hard part around the bone end. Cover with cold water, bring slowly to boil and simmer until done, allowing about half an hour to pound. Another way is to take ham from water one and a half hour before done, remove skin and bake, basting often with vinegar mixed with brown sugar. Use in thin slices, with a little of the fat.

CHICKEN LIVERS AND BACON.—Broil thin slices of bacon in a very hot oven. They may be laid separately in a biscuit tin. Drain. Put chicken livers in a covered baking dish with a very little water and cook slowly until done. Put bacon and livers through the food chopper together, season with salt and pepper and spread between slightly buttered white bread.

FRUIT AND NUT FILLING.—Put together an equal amount of raisins and dates, and one third the amount of nut meats, and grind all together in the foodchopper. Add a little water and cook to a paste. When cold, add a few drops of lemon juice.

Prepare the dates by covering with boiling water three minutes and then plunging into cold water. The skins will then peel off. Remove stones. The seedless raisins should soak about five minutes in boiling water and then be skimmed out so not to get any grit. Rinse in a second hot water and skim out. Dry in the air.

EGG AND HAM.—Cook eggs half an hour. Put through food chopper with an equal amount of broken pieces of boiled ham. Mix with salt, pepper and a little melted butter.

Cakes

RAISIN CAKE.—Two cups of boiling water, one pound of washed seedless raisins, two cups of brown sugar, four tablespoons of melted butter and one-third teaspoon of salt boiled five minutes after it begins to boil. When cold, add one even teaspoon of salt, half a teaspoon each of allspice and cinnamon and three and a half or four cups of pastry flour. Bake in a loaf about two inches thick in a moderate oven one hour.

FROSTED CUP CAKES.—Two thirds cup of butter or chicken fat, creamed with two cups of sugar. Beat in two well-beaten eggs, two teaspoons of vanilla or lemon extract. Sift four cups of sifted flour again with one even teaspoon of soda and two even teaspoons of cream of tartar, and add to mixture alternately with two cups of sweet milk. Fill gem pans about one third full of batter and bake half an hour in a moderate oven.

ICING.—Whites of two eggs and four teaspoons of lemon juice mixed lightly together. Gradually add two cups of powdered sugar and then beat hard five minutes. Spread on cold cakes.

OATMEAL COOKIES.—One cup of butter creamed with heaping cup of sugar until very light. Dissolve one teaspoon each of salt and sugar in three tablespoons of boiling water and then fill cup half full of cold water, and add to butter mixture. Mix together three cups each of rolled oats and flour. Beat half of this in until smooth and then add the remainder and stir smooth. Take small amount at a time and without kneeding roll thin and cut into rounds. Bake in fairly quick oven. These will remain crisp if closed tightly in tin pail.

IDEAL SCHOOL LUNCH.—Mince boiled ham and spread between slices of buttered bread. Usually children will not care for much seasoning and will prefer the ham plain. Combine with a dish of steamed prunes. Wash prunes and put in steamer over a good head of steam and cook until plump. Roll in sugar while hot and set to cool.

Other Acceptable Foods for the Box

STUFFED EGGS.—Boil eggs twenty minutes. Carefully remove shell and cut lengthwise. Remove yolks, putting the whites of each egg together so they will not get mixed. Mash the yolks very fine with enough softened butter, pepper and salt to flavor. Also use a little finely chopped pickle and a very little prepared mustard. When thoroughly blended, fill whites, press together and wrap each egg closely in paraffin paper.

Small packages of cleansed and dried raisins with a few nut meats are liked by everyone.

Stoned dates, filled with either cream cheese, peanut butter, half a walnut of pecan nuts, are equally good.

An apple, or orange in season, or a bunch of grapes are very refreshing.

Naming the Lunch

So there may be no mistake in the "brand" of lunch your customers are buying, and after you know your venture is going to be a success, it will be wise to name your lunch. Your own name may appear, or a name such as "Home Lunch from Blakely."

For an enterprising woman who lives near a school or a manufacturing establishment, the lunch box idea may be developed into a substantial business.

sunny disposition—may your tribe increase. Good by and good luck to all. SUNSHINE.

Sunshine.—Here's something to go with your philosophy of life:

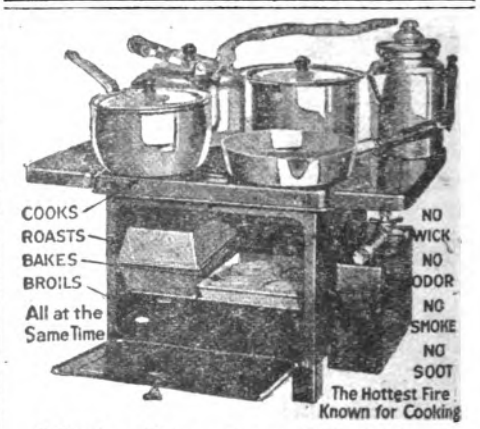
"I've no doubt but I could double quite my quantity of trouble, but a trouble's but a bubble and soon vanishes from sight;
I could probably be tearful if I wanted to, or fearful, but I can as well be cheerful if I go about it right.
And I get each day a measure of quite philosophic pleasure just by laying up a treasure of the sunshine on my way,
That shall comfort me hereafter and attune my voice to laughter that shall ring from floor to rafter when it comes a rainy day."

—Ed.

STATESVILLE, N. C.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Here I am again rolling my wheel chair into your happy circle and you had better get your toes out of the way.



Really, I had no idea that my letter would ever get by the wastebasket, and I am hoping that the editor will have a little pity on me and publish this one at the earliest moment. Here is my reason for wanting it published as soon as possible: I have already received 527 letters in answer to mine printed in March COMFORT, and this is April 26th, and I am receiving from three to ten letters each day. Therefore, it is impossible for me to answer them all personally, which I would love to do, so I am writing this as an answer to all, and I hope that those who haven't heard from me will understand and accept my heartfelt thanks for their nice letters. However, I am keeping all the letters that I get, and I may find time to answer more of them later. Well, sisters, would you believe that you have a few among you who do not believe that the letters in your corner are real? Well you have, and here is a quotation from one of the letters that I have received: "I'm wondering if you are a trumped-up affair to fill space, or a real live boy." Also, "But the best way to break a soap bubble is to stick a pin in it and I'm going to stick a pin in you and see." I answered that letter and told the sister that she wasn't going to stick a pin in me if I knew myself, for I didn't fancy the idea of having a pin stuck in me to see what the effects would be. Say little sister over there, don't blush so furiously! I'm not going to tell your name or give your state, but if you keep up that blushing all the sisters will soon spot you as the one. If the sisters or any who have asked me to quote the prices on my pillow tops will read the rules at the beginning of this department they will see that I would be barred from this corner if I should do so, and of course I wouldn't want to take up the space that would be required for me to give the prices and different designs that I have should this be permitted.

I would like to make a few comments on the letters in this month's COMFORT, but I am real busy and haven't the time now, and, too, I don't feel that I should crowd out some one that is more worthy than I. However, I wish to say to E, that I don't see any reason why a man should not love a "divorcee" as well as a girl that has never had any matrimonial troubles, especially if the "divorcee" isn't responsible for the trouble.

I will have a birthday on the 19th of September and if any one wishes to write me a letter, will be glad to get it, but I cannot promise a reply. Many have asked me the cause of my invalidism, and I wish to say that I was thrown off of a wagon while hauling water for a threshing machine and the wheel passed over my spine. Thanking you one and all for your nice letters, Sincerely, CLARENCE BEAM.

Sorry, Clarence, that your letter couldn't have been printed before but by the time it was received the June and July COMFORT had been printed and the letters for August had been selected. Anyway, this is much nicer for we can all wish you many happy returns of the day. And to the 527 people who have written to Clarence, don't feel offended because he hasn't answered your letter. How would you like to write 527 letters? Besides, you wrote to him for his pleasure, not for yours, didn't you? In a recent letter from a Tennessee sister she said I was the "goddess and judge" of the Sisters' Corner and that she had been treated "like an unworthy culprit and with wholesale indifference," and that she should have been accorded recognition in some way if only to have been informed of the reason why her letter wasn't printed. How-

Little Wonder Oil Stove

The Only Combination Heating and Cooking Oil Stove on the Market

Does as much with one gallon of oil as any other oil stove will do with ten. Instead of 80% of the heat going to waste around the sides of the kettles, ALL of it is utilized in our fuel-saver top. Best oil heater made. Its oven is a splendid baker; and by using a portable oven on top of this stove, you have the best bread-baker made.

The ideal stove for Country Homes, Cottages, Touring, Camping, Yachting, etc. Pays for itself in one year by saving of oil. One gallon burns 16 to 20 hours. Why bother with wood or coal or the old-fashioned oil stove that takes forever to get a meal. It boils a quart of water in three minutes and makes country cooking as easy as with city gas. Generated in three minutes with alcohol, gasoline or kerosine.

Guaranteed as represented or money refunded.

If your dealer cannot supply you, send money order or check direct to factory and stove will be shipped at once with full directions and guarantee.

Prices $17.50 f. o. b. Factory. Weight 30 lbs.

We also make the Little Wonder GAS Stove on the same principle—price $12.50.

BROTHER'S FELT HAT REMADE

HOME SEWING AND MILLINERY

—o—

CARE, REPAIR AND REMAKING OF CLOTHING

—o—

By Caroline Ellis

WE are living in an age when time and energy are at a premium, and it behooves any woman to take a stock account of her time that it may be profitably divided. In families where one pair of hands perform many and widely varied duties, it is necessary to purchase some commodities on which all the labor has been performed, and it is right here that the wise woman will make a careful estimate of the money value of her ability that she may choose to do those things which pay the highest price for her time. For instance, the woman who can make hats and dresses for herself and family and knows the art of repairing, is nowadays a high wage earner and can ill afford time and strength for doing heavy washings. It takes several hours to do a family wash, and in this same amount of time experienced fingers will have a child's dress well along toward completion, and when the expense of hiring the washing done is compared with the price of as well made a garment, after deducting the cost of material, there will be no doubt that time spent in sewing is well spent.

And by "sewing," I do not refer to embroidering or the making of braided rugs. These things belong to hours of leisure, for it takes many of them. If my good friends will pardon personal reference, I will tell you that for years I have wanted to make a set of braided rugs and some very spacious bags are bulging with rug pieces that I have saved year by year. Sometime I shall give myself this great pleasure, but it will be when head and hands can no longer meet the pressing demands upon life, and my time is less valuable to others.

TO GET AN EVENLY HANGING SKIRT.

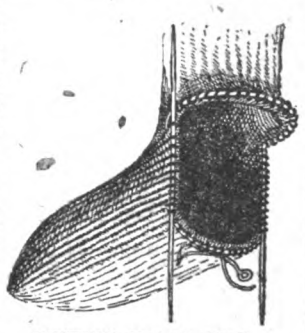
And now to return to the matter of clothes, which most women will admit is ever a problem. For those who can eliminate all other kinds of work and make a business of getting the season's sewing done, it is the ideal way, but with most of us the sewing basket is always full, waiting for attention.

Some Practical Rules for Dressing

It is not the number of changes that stamps a woman as well dressed, but having them all available all the time is the secret of getting along with a few. It is extremely wasteful to cast aside a silk waist because it is much soiled, with perhaps a reamed place under the arm and snaps lost or loosened. Three hours would be sufficient to put such a waist in order, so that the time spent would be worth at least half the cost of a new waist. First, darn the reamed place to a piece of silk cut from bottom of waist, or to a thin piece of muslin. Repair fastenings and then put the waist through two tepid waters in which a little white soap has been dissolved. Rinse twice, roll in heavy towel and iron when nearly dry. I have found that most silks are washable.

Children's clothes are plain in the extreme. Girls are wearing blouses and straight dresses, both with narrow belts worn well down toward the hips.

Conditions during the last few years have changed the viewpoint of most women regarding dress. During the war, the shortage of materials and labor caused patriotic citizens to buy as little new clothing as possible. The interest that this aroused in selecting and utilizing the wardrobe to the best possible advantage did not cease with the fighting. I have talked with many women who declare they will never return to the old thoughtless way of buying and utilizing. For better proof of their decisions, we have the evidence in the overall clubs and old clothes clubs which, through determined organization, have been a direct factor in bringing about the big reduction sales which are advertised throughout the country.



CHILD'S APRON MADE FROM SHIRT.

Wise spending for clothing, as for everything else, does not mean going without what we need or can legitimately afford. It means deciding definitely what we really want and how much we ought to pay for it, and then trying to procure it as economically as possible and to get from it the maximum of service.

Clothing should always be comfortable and healthful; it must protect the body from cold, heat and moisture, according to need, and must allow freedom in all bodily movements. Its lines should be in harmony with or improve the lines of the figure; it should produce a favorable impression of the wearer's individuality, and be suitable to the occasion upon which it is worn. The clothing problem for the individual or the family is how best to obtain this result with the money and the time that can be afforded.

Renewing and Remaking Old Garments

Before making extensive repairs on an old garment, see if the time would not be better spent in cutting out the least worn material and remaking it into a smaller garment. Worn underwear must be patched; the patches made large and finishing at seams if possible. After the patches are in place, cut away the entire section they cover. Often the tops of knitted union suits will wear beyond mending while there is considerable wear left in the legs. Cut these garments in two at the waist, and sew the lower parts onto the tops of partly worn vests. Sew the bottoms of vests into double squares for wash cloths.

KNITTING IN NEW HEEL.

Where there are little ones in the family, the tops of women's stockings are invaluable for caps. Unless for summer wear, make them of several thicknesses. To do this, cut long enough to cover the head and roll back at the edge. Use a bowl, or something similar in shape, over which to draw the several thicknesses so to make sure one will not be longer than the other and to get edges even. It is well to first draw over the bowl the stocking top that is to be worn for the outside. While still on the bowl, sew the edges together with a fairly loose stitch. Slip from bowl, lay flat and trim the cut ends even. Gather securely, roll back the edge and the cap is finished (see illustration).

A very useful sweater coat for a small child can also be made from stocking legs. Cut open lengthwise at the back and press evenly. For a cutting guide use an underwaist pattern that has sleeves, or the top of a dress pattern, first folding in any fullness. Possibly the sleeves can be cut from whole legs, thus doing away with the seam. The little coat will not rip if sewed by hand. Turn the edges once and go over with a single crochet stitch to finish. Fasten with buttons and loops. Several of these, so to have a change, are a great protection in winter. White stockings are preferable.

Colored cotton voiles, especially figured, will often fade, while the fabric remains as strong as new. Coloring seems to be the most satisfactory way of restoring voile, but it must first be bleached and then dipped in a shade of dye darker than any trace of the old coloring that may remain. For bleaching, in a porcelain dish dissolve a scant pound of sal soda in two and one half quarts of boiling water. In a separate porcelain dish, stir one quarter of a pound of chloride of lime with one quart of cold water until it is dissolved. There will be a little sediment, so strain the lime-water through quite thick cotton cloth that has been wrung out of hot water, and add it to the soda water. Boil eight minutes. When cold, carefully pour off into jars or bottles. Use one cup of this solution to five quarts of water, and boil the voile until the color disappears. Use a little stronger solution if necessary, of if the voile is to be bleached white. Change from kettle of solution to a kettle of clear boiling water and boil out the solution, as it is liable to make the voile tender if any remains. Rinse twice in hot water. It is now ready to color. Use soap dyes, or those in powdered form and follow directions.

FALL HAT FROM SILK OR VELVET.

STOCKING-LEG CAP.

For the child's apron, here pictured, the strong portions of a man's percale shirt was used. These shirtings are usually of fast colors and attractive designs, and well worth making into simple aprons or dresses after tops and wristbands are gone. A number of such garments are a great saving of labor to mothers, and for the same reason, too much cannot be said in favor of children wearing rompers and bloomers. For a quick finish to apron, use bias strips of the same; they also make a trimming.

When the edges of coat sleeves become worn, the hems may be ripped, the worn places carefully darned, and slightly deeper hems turned so as to conceal the darning. A worn lower edge of men's trousers may also be repaired by ripping the hem, darning the worn places, and facing the edge with a narrow strip of lightweight woolen cloth. If a piece of cloth is well darned to the seat of trousers before the threadbare parts break open, they will last as long again and will not show. Men who wear knee-length underwear find an inner lining to the knee of trousers very comfortable and that the trousers better retain the pressing.

Use ravelings of the material to darn with when possible.

In remaking for small children, especially a winter coat, care should be taken not to use material that is too stiff and heavy. It is better to use a lighter weight such as broadcloth or velvet and interline it with flannel.

A restless child is made very uncomfortable and often takes cold by the twisting and working up of its night-dress during sleeping hours. A remedy is found in sewing a double piece of cloth to the center back of the night-dress hem, which, when finished, will be about six inches on the hem, and four inches deep. Make three buttonholes in the outer edge and button it onto the hem of the center front, after the style of the envelope chemise.

Every mother finds it a problem to keep children's petticoats and dresses the same length, so this idea may help. Take a petticoat that is just the right length, button it to an underwaist and put it on a coat hanger and hang it up. Now slip over the dress that is to be hemmed and turn according to length of petticoat.

Bound buttonholes are featured in many of the best made garments and in all materials. They are very simply done and are a help to one not experienced in making buttonholes. Material the same as garment, or of a contrasting material and color, gives a trimming effect. Mark the buttonhole on the back. On the right side baste a patch of the material to be used, and stitch by machine the length of the buttonhole on each side. Cut the buttonhole and draw the patch through to the wrong side so that it leaves a piping on the right side. Hem down and press.

Much pressing as a garment is being made goes a long way toward its final good appearance.

For the one who crochets rapidly, scallops may be crocheted right into the material that has been turned into a very narrow hem. Night-dress tops and sleeves, children's waists, corset-cover necks and armholes, ends of towels, etc. At the same time a pretty trimming is made.

For a simple trimming on white dresses, stitch the hem on the machine and then with colored silk or mercerized cotton slip the needle under every other stitch of the machine stitching. White cotton on colored gingham is equally pretty. It is also a pretty finish for handkerchiefs, working on both sides of hem.

Hooks and eyes will not loosen if the needle is inserted first on one side and then on the other, crossing the stitches.

Prolonging the Life of Clothing

Brush clothing thoroughly before attempting to remove spots.

Bagginess at the knees of trousers or at the elbows of coats may in most cases be shrunk out by spreading each leg and sleeve flat on the board and, in shape, letting the stretched edges lay a little full. Cover with a cloth wrung dry out of hot water and press until smooth. Repeat if necessary.

"Shine" is caused by the wearing down of the nap and sometimes of grease. Remove by sponging with solution of one tablespoon of household ammonia to one quart of tepid water. Press over a white cotton cloth and brush up the nap with a stiff brush.

Brush silk with a piece of velvet or a very soft brush. A harsh brush may cut the silk.

If brown shoes are polished before being worn, it will prevent permanent stains, and the use of injurious cleaning preparations will not be necessary. Use only the polishing paste, after which, in case of mud or staining matter, it can be removed with a little cold water and white soap, then rinsed and repolished.

Wet shoes are first stuffed with soft paper to prevent permanent creases and then slowly dried. Change the paper as it becomes damp. Nowadays, a "true" leather sole is a scarce article, much composition being used in its place. If this becomes wet, the life of the shoe is greatly shortened. Rubbers are a matter of economy as well as comfort. Children scuff out the toes and heels of their shoes, and it is worth while to use the little aluminum plates which are not disfiguring.

Ravel and Save Yarn

Seldom is a knitted garment so worn but that by careful raveling a portion of the yarn will be found worth saving. If a part of it is weakened by one or two of the strands being worn, save it to darn with. Only the perfect yarn is worth the time of reknitting. A boy's slip-on sweater will usually first wear across the lower part of front and under the arms, and as soon as the first stitches drop, unless mended, will very soon become past mending. Where more than one child in the family, either boys or girls, are wearing this very useful garment, it is an excellent plan to make them all alike, as thereby parts can be raveled from two worn sweaters and reknit into one new one.

Four valuable uses for raveled wool are scarfs, which may be made of several colors, hoods for babies, bedroom slippers, and wristers. The Red

Designs in Tatting, Filet and Roll Stitch

Effective Useful Design

Insertion

THE insertion showing two sections of this design which is especially good for a bedspread is made in separate parts which are afterwards joined.

Of finer cotton this design is suitable for towels or scarf ends.

Work is begun in the center with a ch 9, join in ring, ch 3.

1st round.—26 d c, in ring, join ch 6.

2nd round.—Skip 1 d c, 1 d c in next st, ch 3, sk 1, 1 d c, ch 3, sk 1, 1 d c, 7 d c in next 7 sts, ch 3, sk 1, 1 d c, ch 3, sk 1, 1 d c, ch 3, sk 1, 7 d c, join to first ch 6, ch 3.

3rd round.—2 d c under ch, ch 2, 3 d c under same ch. This makes a shell, ch 5, sk 1, 1 ch in last row, 1 shell 6 d c under next ch, 2 d c on first d c, 5 d c, 2 d c over group of doubles, 1 shell, ch 5, 1 shell, 2 d c, 5 d c, 2 d c, join to first shell, ch 3.

4th round.—Shell on shell, ch 1, 6 d c, ch 1, shell on shell, 2 d c, 8 d c, 2 d c, 1 shell, ch 1, 6 d c, ch 1, 1 shell, 2 d c, 8 d c, 2 d c. join, ch 3.

5th round.—Shell, ch 3, 5 d c, ch 3, shell, 2 d c, 11 d c, 2 d c shell, ch 3, 5 d c, ch 3 shell, 2 d c, 11 d c, 2 d c, join, ch 3.

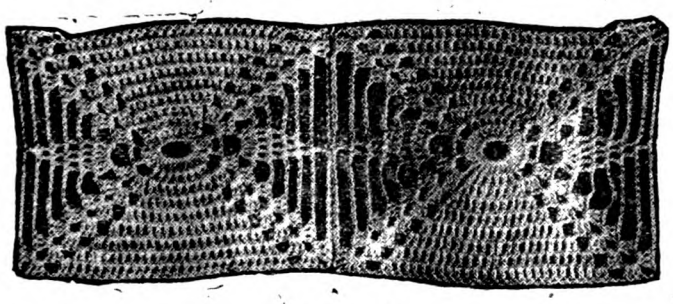
6th round.—Shell, ch 5 or 6, 4 d c ch same length as first shell, 2 d c at beginning and end of double shell, ch, 4 d c, ch, shell. doubles as on opposide side, join, ch 3.

7th round.—Same as last excepting ends where chains following shells should be of about 7 sts according to how one works, then 3 doubles, ch of same length as first, shell, etc.

8th round.—On ends make ch of 10 or 12 sts, 2 d c ch same as first, shell and finish row as usual.

9th round.—Shell on shell, ch about 13 sts., 1 d c, ch, shell and repeat. Upon completing round break thread. These sections or parts are afterwards joined by placing the right sides of two together and making 1 s c under chains of two corner shells, ch sufficiently, 1 s c over two center doubles, ch, 1 s c in center of two corner shells. Break thread.

In making a bedspread after joining strips in this way, sew sides together placing the doubles opposite each other.



Edging

Begin with ch 9, join in ring, ch 3.

1st round.—29 d c in ring join, ch 6.

2nd round.—Skip 1 d c, 1 d c in next st, 7 d c in next 7 sts, * ch 3, sk 1 d c, 1 d c in next st, repeat from * 9 times, join to first ch 6, sl st over 3 sts of ch.

3rd round.—Ch 1, 2 d c on first d c, 1 d c on each excepting last double on which work 2 d c, shell of 3 d c, ch 1, 3 d c in first space ch 3, shell in third sp, ch 3, shell in fifth sp, repeat making shell in seventh, ninth and last sps, ch 2.

INSERTION.

4th round.—Group of doubles on doubles making 2 d c on the first and last, ch 2, shell on shell, ch 2, 6 d c under ch 3, shell, 6 d c repeat 3 times, shell, ch 2.

5th round.—Group doubles, shell on shell, 5 d c on 6 d c repeat ending with shell, ch 2.

6th round.—Doubles, shell ch 3, 4 d c, repeat ending with shell, ch 2.

7th round.—Group doubles, shell, ch 5, 3 d c, repeat, ending with shell, ch 2.

8th round.—Group doubles, shell, ch 7, 2 d c, repeat, ending with shell, ch 2.

9th round.—Group doubles, shell, ch 8, 1 d c, repeat, ending with shell.

Join by ch 9 from upper shells of two sections, 1 s c through corresponding single d c, ch 9, 1 s c on next two shells.

Spider Web Yoke

Materials. No. 70 mercerized crochet cotton, No. 13 steel hook.

This work is made in four pieces and joined. Pattern is begun at center point of our illustration.

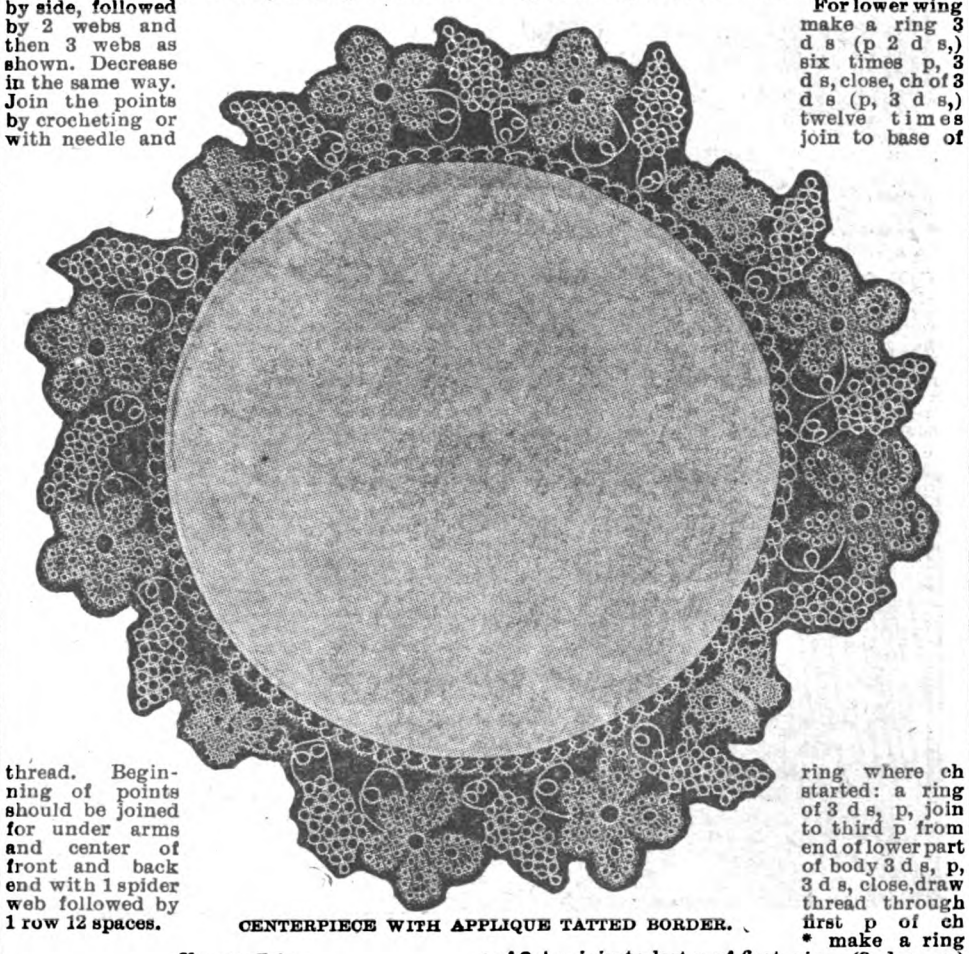
Begin with chain 45 stitches, turn, 1 d c in 9th st from hook, ch 2, sk 2 sts, 1 d c in next, repeat making 13 spaces in all, ch 5, turn.

2nd row.—1 d c on d c, 5 more sps, 4 d c or 1 blk, 6 sps, ch 5, turn.

3rd row.—5 sps, 1 blk, ch 3, 1 blk, 5 sps, ch 5, turn.

4th row.—4 sps, 1 blk, ch 4, 1 treble in ch 3 in last row, ch 4, 1 blk, 4 sps, ch 5, turn.

5th row.—3 sps, 1 blk, ch 4, 3 s c, over treble, ch 4, 1 blk, 3 sps, ch 5, turn.



6th row.—2 sps, 1 blk, ch 6, 5 s c over 3 s c, ch 6, 1 blk, 2 sps, turn.

7th row.—1 sp, 1 blk, ch 3, 1 blk, ch 5, 3 s c over 5 s c, ch 5, 1 blk, 3 sps, ch 5, turn.

8th row.—4 sps, 1 blk, ch 4, 1 treble in center single, ch 4, 1 blk, ch 4, 1 treble, ch 4, 1 blk in sp at end of last row, ch 11 turn.

9th row.—3 d c in first 3 sts of this ch, 1 d c on last d c in blk, ch 3, 3 s c, ch 3, 1 blk under 3 times, 2 d s, join to end of first ch (ring of 6 d s, close and draw thread through end of the ch) 3 times (2 d s, p,) 3 times 2 d s, join to p, 1 d s join where ch on other side started and fasten off, sew the ch as ch before tr, ch 3, 1 blk under ch after tr, 5 sps ch 5, turn.

Now repeat pattern, decreasing the spaces on straight side of work and increasing on other side as directed in 8th row, making 2 webs side by side, followed by 2 webs and then 3 webs as shown. Decrease in the same way. Join the points by crocheting or with needle and thread. Beginning of points should be joined for under arms and center of front and back end with 1 spider web followed by 1 row 12 spaces.

CENTERPIECE WITH APPLIQUE TATTED BORDER.

Upper Edge

Fasten thread in chain at end of upper edge ch 6 fasten in next ch and continue around.

2nd row.—9 s c under each ch 6.

Beading for Bottom

Fasten thread in a space, ch 15, skip 4 sts, 3 d c, ch 2, 3 d c in 5th st, ch 10, skip 10 sts, 3 d c, ch 2, 3 d c in last st and fasten in top of sp ch started from.

2nd row.—Ch 3, fasten in next sp, 3 d c, ch 2, 3 d c under ch 2 in fan, ch 5, 1 s c under ch 10, ch 5, fan on fan, ch 3, turn. Two more rows same as 2nd then one same as first and repeat.

Centerpiece with Applique Tatted Border

BY KITTIE WRIGHT.

No. 20 mercerized cotton was used for the work illustrated.

After completing arrange the leaves, grapes and butterflies as shown around a linen center and fasten together neatly on the wrong side, with needle and thread.

Begin by edging a circle of linen with a tatted edge made as follows; Rings, 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s close, chains, 3 d s, 1 p, 2 d s, 1 p, 2 d s, 1 p, 2 d s, 1 p, 3 d s. Repeat, join and overcast to hemmed edge by center picot of each ring.

EDGING.

Butterfly Motif

For the body make a ch 13 d s, p, 6 d s, close, ch (2 d s, p) six times, 2 d s, join to first d s, or first ch, 1 d s, p, 2 d s, p, 1 d s, join to same d s on other side (2 d s, p), six times, 2 d s, join at base of ring and fasten off with needle and thread. Whip the two outside chs to the first of center ch, completing the lower part of body; for the upper part of 7 d s, join at top of lower part make a ch to p of ch between 2 d s, part, 1 d s, join below (2 d s, p,) before for antenna make a ch of 34 d s, draw to form a curl at the tip and fasten out between first and second of the three rings at top of upper part, make the other antenna the same way, fastening between second and third rings.

For lower wing make a ring 3 d s (p 2 d s,) six times p, 3 d s, close, ch of 3 d s (p, 3 d s,) twelve times join to base of ring where ch started: a ring of 3 d s, p, join to third p from end of lower part of body 3 d s, p, 3 d s, close, draw thread through first p of ch * make a ring of 3 d s, join to last p of first ring (3 d s, p,) twice 3 d s, close, draw thread through next p of ch and repeat from * until you have made 13 rings in all joining last by middle p to first p of lower part of body fasten at base of first ring. For upper wing make a ring as for lower wing only of 9 ps a chain same as for lower wing but with 18 p joining at base of ring, then a ring as for lower wing joining middle p of upper part of body, draw through next p of ch, make a ring joining first p to last p of preceding ring and by middle p to next p of body. Make another ring joining to next p of ch and last p of preceding ring. Join middle p to first p at upper end of lower body, join middle p to middle p of the first free ring on the lower wing and another p joined to next ring of lower wing.

The next 6 rings are made thus; 3 d s, join to last p of preceding ring, 3 d s, p (2 d s, p), 4 times 3 d s, close, skip 1 p of ch, draw through next. Make a large ring joining first 2 picots to last 2 picots of preceding ring. Make 3 more large rings then finish off with 3 small ones, as at first, joining the last to the 3rd p of upper part of the body. To complete upper wing join to 2nd free p of second large ring, make a ch of 13 d s, p) 4 times, 3 d s, join to middle picot of next large ring, ch like the last, ring of 3 d s, p, 3 d s join to middle picot of next ch, 3 d s, p, 3 d s, k, close; a ch, a ring, a ch, a ring, joining 1st and 2nd picots to 3rd and 2nd picots of preceding ring, a ch, join to 1st free picot of sixth large ring. Make the other side and the upper and lower wings in same way.

Grapeleaf Motif

Use double thread for large center ring of 20 p, separated by 1 d s, close, cut thread. Center ring of leaflet, 7 p separated by 1 d s, close, cut thread. Now, 1 d s, p, 1 d s, p, 1 d s. Join to large center ring, 1 d s, join to next p in center ring, 3 more picots separated by 1 d s, join to 1st p in center ring of leaflet.

Make a ring of 7 p separated by 1 d s, joining to last p in 1st ring and 2nd p in large ring. Make 5 more rings in the same way, joining to center ring of leaflet and to last ring. Join to large center ring as the first small ring was joined.

Make center ring for second leaflet of 8 p, separated by 2 d s, close and cut thread.

Make another leaf same as the first, making 9 small rings around center and joining as before.

For third leaflet center ring make 10 p separated by 3 d s, close and cut thread. Surround this with 11 small rings, joining as before to center ring.

Make 4 leaflets like second and 5 like the first. Use double thread for chain which forms stem as shown in illustration. Draw stem to a curve and join between first and last leaflets.

Grape Motif

Bunches of grapes are made of groups of small rings, each of 8 d s, short p, 8 d s, p, 8 d s, p, 8 d s, close. Make 25 or more rings, arrange in bunches and with needle and thread tie together. Make a ch for the stem as shown.

Simple Filet Yoke

BY MRS. STELLA MINTON.

Materials. No. 30 crochet cotton, No. 10 steel hook. This yoke opens in front.

Begin with ch 66 sts, turn.

1st row.—1 d c in 9th st from hook, ch 2, sk 2 sts, 1 d c in next, repeat making 20 sps in all this row. Ch 5, turn.

2nd row.—9 sps in next sps, 2 d c, 1 p, 2 d c, 10 sps, ch 5, turn. All blocks in this pattern are made of 4 d c with picot between, as in this row.

3rd row.—9 sps, 1 blk, ch 3, 1 blk, 8 sps, ch 9, fasten in end of first ch, turn as one adds the edge to the pattern as worked under ch 9, make 3 d c, 1 p, 7 d c, 1 p, 5 d c, 1 d c on d c end of last row.

4th row.—7 sps, 1 blk, ch 3, 1 blk, ch 3, 1 blk, 8 sps, ch 5, turn.

5th row.—7 sps, 4 blks with chs between, 6 sps, ch 9, fasten in stitch of scallop before 2nd p, turn.

6th row.—Work under ch 9 as before, 5 sps, 5 blks with chs between, 6 sps, ch 5, turn.

7th row.—5 sps, 6 blks with chs between, 4 sps, ch 9, 1 s c in center st between picots in last scallop, ch 9, 1 s c between picots in 1st scallop, turn.

8th row.—Work under both chs 9 as before, then 3 sps, 7 blks with chs between, 4 sps, ch 5, turn.

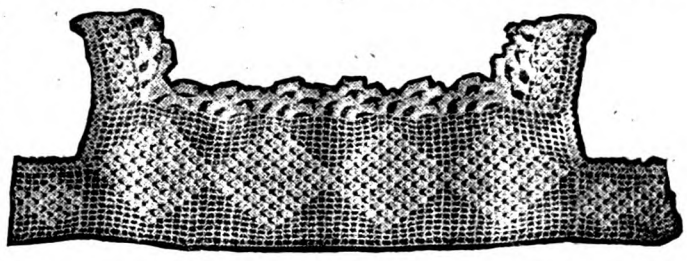
9th row.—3 sps, 8 blks, 2 sps, ch 9, 1 s c in st before 2nd p in scallop in last row, turn.

10th row.—Work under ch 9, balance of row same as 8th row.

11th row.—Same as 7th row, ending with 2 chs 9.

12th row.—Work under chs, balance same as 6th row.

13th row.—Same as 5th row, ending with 2 chs, 9.



14th row.—Work under chs, balance same as 4th row.

15th row.—Same as 3rd, ending with ch 9, turn.

16th row.—Same as 2nd row.

17th row.—Same as 3rd row, ending with 2 chs. Repeat the pattern making 2 diamonds and omitting scallop on last 5 rows so as to allow for shoulder straps. For under arms, from lower edge make 5 sps, 1 blk, 4 sps, turn, 3 sps, 2 blks, 4 sps, turn, 3 sps, 3 blks, 2 sps, turn, 1 sp, 4 blks, 2 sps, turn, repeat work finishing this diamond and making 1 more, break thread.

Join in end of last row over last diamond and working across ends of 5 rows where scallop was omitted, make shoulder straps as follows: 2 sps, 1 blk, 2 sps, 1 s c in scallop, 1 sp, 2 blks, 1 sp, turn, 2 sps, 1 blk, 2 sps, turn, repeat, making ending 5th 2 sps, 1 s c in scallop in st before p, ch 3, 1 s c in 2nd st after p, turn, 1 sp, 2 blks, 1 sp, ch 5, turn, 2 sps, 1 blk, 2 sps, making last d c in same st in scallop with single in last row, turn make 2 more rows, alternating the blks and ending 5 rows with ch 9, 1 s c in same st with others in scallop. Work under ch as usual, make 3 more rows of sps and blks ending 8th row with ch 9, 1 s c between picots in last scallop, ch 9, 1 s c in center of 2nd scallop on the front. Repeat until straps are required length. Break thread.

BACK OF FILET YOKE.

Make another piece of work for opposite front in the same way. Then a piece 4 diamonds wide for the back, omitting scallop until one has completed 11 rows of blks and sps, then ch 9, 1 s c between 8th and 9th rows, and when finishing work omit scallop on last 5 rows.

Join under arm pieces and shoulder straps to back with needle and thread.

11th row.—2 sps, 1 blk, ch 5, 15 s c, ch 5, 1 blk, ch 3, 1 blk, ch 5, 15 s c, ch 5, 1 blk, 2 sps, ch 5, turn.

12th row.—1 sp, 1 blk, ch 5, 21 s c, ch 5, 1 blk between blks, ch 5, 21 s c, ch 5, 1 blk, 1 sp, ch 5, turn.

13th row.—Same as 11th row.

14th row.—Same as 10th row.

15th row.—Same as 9th row.

Continue reversing the pattern in this way until the fourth web is finished, then make several rows of spaces and repeat the group of four webs.

The pillow top illustrated has five rows of spaces between each group of webs.

This idea can be changed a little if one prefers by omitting the corner webs and also the center group and in its place working or darning in one's initial or monogram.

To copy this pattern exactly make 1 blk, 87 sps, 1 blk, ch 3, turn.

2nd row.—1 blk, 13 sps, 1 blk, 29 sps, 1 blk, 29 sps, 1 blk, 13 sps, 1 blk, ch 3, turn.

3rd row.—1 blk, 12 sps, now copy directions from * in 3rd row as previously given.

3rd round.—1 tr c between next r sts, ch 3, fasten in top of tr, ch 4, fasten in same place, ch 3, fasten in same place, thus forming a trefoil, ch 3, 1 s c between next r sts, ch 3, repeat from beginning of row, join, ch 5.

4th round.—Fasten in top of 1st trefoil, ch 5, 1 s c in next trefoil, repeat around, join, ch 4.

5th row.—2 d tr c in ch st just before trefoil, ch 1, 3 d tr c in same st, 3 r sts in center of ch between 2nd and 3rd trefoil, ch 1, 3 r sts in same st. Repeat around making 8 tr groups and 8 r st fans. Join to 1st d tr c, sl st to ch 1, ch 4.

6th round.—2 d tr c under ch 1, ch 1, 3 d tr c, ch 2, r st fan under ch 1 in center of fan in last row. Repeat around and join as in last row.

7th, 8th and 9th rounds.—Same as 6th round. These complete crown.

10th round.—The same until one has made 7 groups tr c and r st fans. Fasten off and break thread.

11th, 12th, 13th and 14th rounds.—Fasten thread on opposite side under ch, and 1st tr, ch 4, work same as 10th round.

Beading for Ribbon

Make 1 d tr c in center of each tr sh, between these and r st fans and in center of each r st fan, with ch 7 between. Repeat round.

Edge the front and neck with fans of 7 r sts each, worked in every other tr.

This cap may easily be enlarged by making the crown larger, or repeating the 6th round twice or more before commencing the front.

Vandyke Point Edging

This effective pattern is especially suitable for edging luncheon cloths or doilies, as it fits around a curved edge so nicely. Ch 10 sts, turn.

1st row.—9 d c in 9 sts, ch 3, 1 d c, ch 6, turn.

2nd row.—1 d c under ch 3, ch 2, 9 d c on 9 d c ch 3, turn.

VANDYKE POINT EDGING.

3rd row.—9 d c, ch 2, 1 d c, ch 2, 1 d c, ch 3, 1 d c, ch 6, turn.

4th row.—2 under ch 3, 1 d c on d c, 2 d c in sp, d c on d c, 2 d c in sp, 1 d c on d c, ch 3, turn.

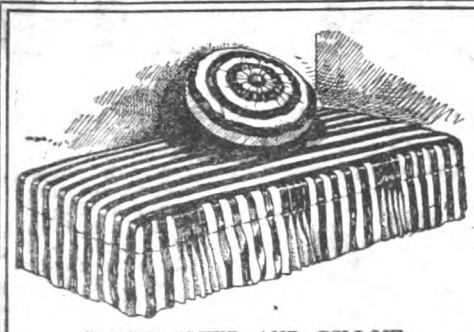
5th row.—9 d c, 2 sps, ch 5, turn.

6th row.—3 sps, 9 d c, sl st over 9 d c, ch 3.

7th row.—Same as 1st row, working 9 doubles as in the 4th row. Repeat pattern.

Points are pretty edged with color in single crochet.

Safety Skirt Hangers



Material. One good-sized ivory ring, one spool silkateen, two large safety pins, crochet hook.

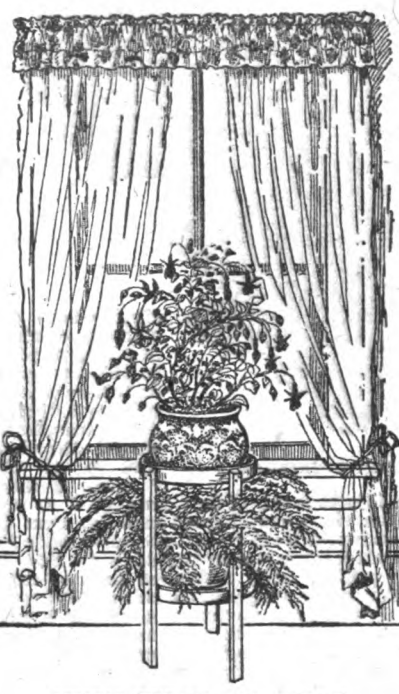
1st row.—Crochet closely over ring, join, turn, ch 5, sk 1, 2 d c, ch 2, sk 1, 2 d c, repeat, making 7 d c, ch 3, turn.

2nd row.—2 d c in each sp, 1 d c on d c, repeat.

3rd row.—Ch 5, sk 2, 1 d c, repeat, making 7 sps as in 1st row.

Repeat these two rows until work measures one and one half inches, join to safety pin by making singles over the back of the pin. Two of these make a set or pair.

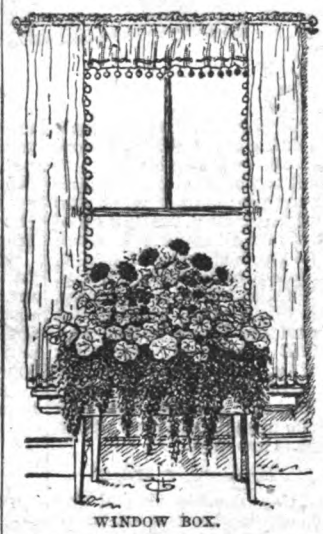
COUCH COVER AND PILLOW



HOME-MADE FURNITURE AND FURNISHINGS

By Clara Huntington

Little Touches That Make a House Cheerful



I CAN think of nothing that so pleases the eye or sends forth the same homelike atmosphere as a profusion of flowering and foliage plants in winter-time. Someone has said that plants have a "kindly spirit," and I believe it, for nothing responds so readily or gives so much in return for a little careful attention.

Before we touch upon the three window arrangements here illustrated, let us see if we are prepared to meet the fundamental requirements of house-plant life, which are good drainage, plenty of light and sun, fresh air and moisture. We all know that our finest specimens are grown right in the kitchen where they get the steam from the cooking and fresh air from the frequent opening of outside doors. For healthy drainage, a plant should be potted as follows: On the bottom of the flower pot put a broken piece from the side of an old pot, concave side down, so it will not lie flat over the hole; next put in a layer of charcoal in small pieces to prevent the earth from washing out when the plant is watered. Now a little earth is then put in, and then with one hand the plant is held in place with roots straightened, while with the other the pot is gradually filled with soil and lightly pressed around the roots.

WINDOW BOX.

Most window-box failures are caused by the plant roots standing in water. Where the box itself is filled with soil, there should be in the bottom at least three inches of fairly fine charcoal. If care is taken to find out about how much water the soil will absorb, and then water with regularity, no difficulty will be experienced from too much water.

Many prefer to put their plants into individual pots before placing them in the window-box. Water standing in the bottom of jardinieres and becoming foul, will kill most plants. An excellent precaution is to put strips of wood in the bottom of jars and thus raise the pot above any water that may run through.

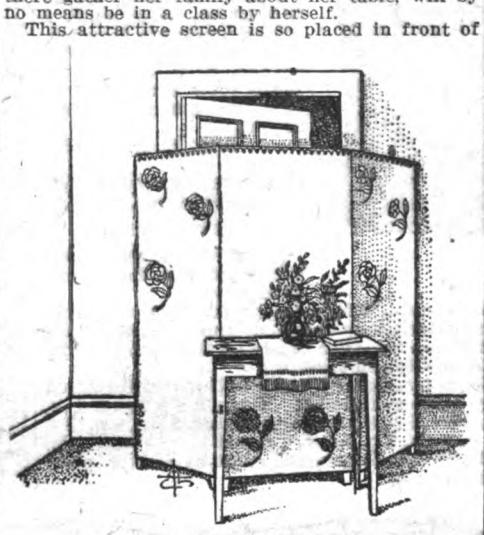
House plants also require an occasional spraying to keep them healthy. To do this, first lay a soft folded cloth over the earth and close to the plant to prevent a loss of plant food by washing it out of the soil. Use tepid water in a small watering pot, changing the angle of the plant so that the water will reach the under side of the leaves.

HANGING FERN BASKET.

Flowering plants for the house that best thrive under varying atmospheric conditions are begonias, fuchsias, geraniums, primroses, petunias and verbenas. Nasturtiums will also do wonderfully well in winter if kept in a sunny exposure. Train them along the edge of the casements and across the window tops. Gaudy jardinieres are to be avoided for the attainment of best effects, for they seriously detract from the plants themselves. Use only neutral colors with little if any decorations.

The first illustration shows an artistic arrangement of net curtains with valance of flowered silkateen, a jar of fuchsia, and underneath one filled with native ferns. The flower-stand is attractively made from two butter firkin covers which are held in position by three straight pieces of wood. The stand is given two coats of light gray paint which will prevent the covers from warping.

The window-box is made of pine and stained a dark green. Inside of the box is a lining made from zinc which is soldered watertight and the edge cut high enough to be turned back to cover the top edge of box. This will prevent water from getting between the box and zinc lining. The Colonial window curtains are made from muslin and trimmed with ball fringe.



'NAH DOOR STOP.

The fern basket is hung from a bird cage hook which is screwed into the window finish. The basket is just the ordinary type found in most general stores. It is a little longer than wide and is painted a light moss green. In the basket are two shallow fer[illegible]s, each containing ferns of a different kind, and all hanging their fronds over the edge together make a handsome display. This window only gets the afternoon sun which is usually a very satisfactory exposure for ferns that are hung directly in the window. Here the sash curtain is used.

Screening the Pantry Door

This is a very happy thought for the wise woman who in winter time will close her dining-room and serve her meals in the kitchen. After all, many of the modern homes are built without the regulation dining-room, for we are living in an age where economy of space, fuel and labor are important considerations, and the woman who would make her kitchen an inviting spot and there gather her family about her table, will by no means be in a class by herself.

This attractive screen is so placed in front of the pantry door that it gives the kitchen a "dressed-up" appearance and in no way interrupts a free passage in and out. A little ingenuity, some cotton material, and light strips of wood are all that is necessary for the construction of such a screen. For hinges that hold the two sides to the center section of frame, use heavy tape or two thicknesses of strong cotton cloth and tack them securely. Five are about the right number. The one illustrated was covered with plain, coarse gingham and decorated with a little free drawing in water colors which any school girl can do. An artistic effect is gained by placing in front a small table for a plant or for use as a serving table.

SCREENING THE PANTRY DOOR.

House Socks

An outfit of durable and warm house socks is a comfort in any household, particularly where there are children coming in with damp or cold feet, or to put on in the evening in place of their heavy school boots. Parts of old heavy overcoats, tops of women's boots, or various kinds of home-cured skins are among materials that are excellent for this purpose.

HOUSE SOCKS.

The best patterns for the soles are obtained by having the wearer stand barefooted on a sheet of brown paper, and with a lead pencil trace around the foot, allowing a little extra length at the toe. The tops are easily shaped from a stocking laid flat. Cut a little wider than the stocking, and the top large enough for the foot to slip through. Where skins are used, cut them from the back side with the point of a sharp knife. Sew edges together from the back as you would two selvage edges of a sheet. Use strong waxed thread. Line with some soft material. Where heavy cloth materials are used, as in picture, bind all edges and join top and soles by sewing only through the bindings. Inner soles of fur are very warm; also sheepskin or heavy cloth cut double. In cutting, make allowance for all linings and innersoles.

Decorative Door Stops

Devices for holding a door partly or way open are a desideratum in every home. Most commonly used for this purpose is a brick covered with carpeting, but they are awkward to use without a handle. The one here illustrated was first lightly padded with Canton flannel and then covered with khaki. Over this is a covering made from heavy twine which may be knitted or crocheted to fit. The handle is firmly crocheted from the twine. Each time across it is well to crochet it into the covering as it looks better than to make it separately and then sew it to place. The twine may be first made into a skein and then dipped into strong coffee and a color obtained that will harmonize with the khaki.

COVERED BRICK DOOR STOP.

Dinah as a door stop presents a very striking figure and she is often found on sale at church fairs. A tall quart bottle such as table syrups come in is the required foundation. The bottle is filled with dry sand to give the necessary weight, and the cork stopper is firmly driven in. The neck of the bottle is padded with cotton which shapes the head, and then the head and whole bottle are covered with black cloth. Arms with mitten-shaped hands are stuffed and sewed on at the neck. Eyes, nose and mouth are drawn out with water colors such as children use. If black curled hair is at hand, catch on a little to each side of the head, but it is not necessary as the head covering may be drawn closer around, and for this purpose a small red bandana is used. Fold the handkerchief cornerways, or if too bulky cut it in two. This leaves pointed ends which are tied in front. Select bright calico for the dress, and make an apron and kerchief for the shoulders from white muslin. The kerchief is cut three-cornered, which brings a point at the back, and the apron has sash-ends.

Couch Covering

A slip-cover is a very practical daytime arrangement for a bed couch, and striped materials make up most attractively. The one shown on Page 20 is made as follows: One straight strip begins with a hem at the floor, up to top and running the entire length of couch and down to the floor at the opposite end where it is again finished with a hem. This strip should be wide enough to fall over the back of couch about six inches. It is then closely squared or mitered at the two top back corners which holds the cover in place. The front edge of this strip joins a plaited flounce which extends to the floor and is hemmed. The two ends of flounce are sewed squarely to the front edges of strip that hangs over the two ends. A pretty way to arrange the fullness is to make a cluster of plaits deep enough to bring the darkest stripes together, and stitching them deep enough to form a boxing. This arrangement will always hold the cover in place.

The round pillow is made by seaming together a strip just long enough to easily extend around the pillow. It should be wide enough to reach from center front to center back. The two edges are then gathered, drawn tightly and finished with a button. For a pillow stuffing, cotton batting does very well. Cut it into small squares, put it into a tin and heat it in the oven until it is fluffy. Watch it carefully and stir it frequently.

A home-made wood box is a handy thing in the kitchen or sun porch.

Dress, Powder and Health

By Frances L. Garside

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

A STATEMENT by Health Commissioner Copeland of New York City has set the feminine world agog, and a large portion of the masculine.

It was to the effect that low shoes and silk stockings, which women wear in winter, do not shorten their lives; that there are no bad effects from wearing thin waists and low-cut necks; that high heels work no harm, and that rouge and powder are not unbecoming.

This statement was followed by statements of women who agree with him, by women who don't, and by the decree of a vicar in Paris that entry to the church is forbidden women wearing low-cut waists and skirts that do not reach to the ankles. Everybody is having a hand in the discussion—except the men dressmakers who have made the fashions. They are keeping discreetly silent, perhaps for the reason that they are engaged on styles more atrocious and scandalous to bring out next season.

Copyright by Underwood & Underwood.

DR. FLORENCE L. MEREDITH.

Women who are at the heads of women's departments in banks, offices and other big institutions are on record as saying that lack of proper dress for business is retarding the progress of the sex; that there is no hope for the advancement of the girl who comes to work wearing a very thin waist and a marshmallow nose. A woman journalist from Japan favors the American styles because they are more adaptable than the Japanese kimona, claiming that there are extremists in fashion in every country, and not more in America than in her own.

The woman speaking with the best authority is Dr. Florence L. Meredith, a girl health expert. She has made physical examinations of 12,000 girls in her experience, including four years of incoming freshmen in Wellesley, the employees of a large factory in Boston, and 700 business and professional women examined at a Y. W. C. A. Health Demonstration Center in New York City.

"I do not think," she says, "that Dr. Copeland speaks for the girl who is ambitious to make something of herself. He speaks for the girl who is so stupid and sex-centered that she will sacrifice anything, even the health of her body, to win the admiration of a man; the girl who is so ailing that she has to use rouge to present a counterfeit of health; who is so dirty that she has to use powder to cover up her unwholesome skin, who cares so little about being of use in the world that she is willing to cripple herself, falsely believing, as hundreds of girls have told me, 'that men wouldn't like to see them in what they consider unappealing clothes.'

"I do not think high heels or corsets are a cause of premature death. They merely lower efficiency. The woman who wears them is merely less alive. She is 75 per cent alive instead of 100 per cent.

"I do not know when I have seen a respectable foot or a girl with a good posture. The type of shoe and corset worn has been largely responsible. The girl who begins to get plump around the waist and hips, instead of exercising this excess fat off, or denying herself sweets, puts on a tight corset. The modern corset, it is true, is not the harmful invention it used to be. I object to it rather on the ground that it induces laziness and sloppiness of carriage.

"The high-heeled shoe is another matter. It is positively harmful, and it is the more insidious because the results do not show principally in the foot. Backaches, headaches and a long train of minor disabilities follow in the wake of the wrong posture which high-heeled shoes necessitate.

"My objection to thin clothes is not based on the matter of health, if it is such that the body can keep itself warm. My objection to thin clothing is a moral one.

"Most women have very vague ideas about their responsibility in the matter of tempting men away from what their own ideals would have them cleave to. They still believe in the old theory that perfectly innocent and unoffending girls are seduced by depraved men, and will not admit what they could observe with the greatest ease, that a good percentage of hitherto innocent and well-meaning boys have been carried to the point of loss of self-restraint by girls who should have known better. The word of countless men of every station is to the effect that clothes which women do, or do not, wear, make clean living a thousand times harder than it need be.

"I think most men, especially since the war, have got a different interest in women and girls, and I think they realize that if women have not reliable health they are of very little use in any sphere of life.

"And I think the best type of girl generally feels that if she has no way of interesting men except by deforming her feet and figure and painting her face, she will go husbandless—believing singleness would be blessedness in comparison to living with a man who could admire such a woman.

"Modern fashions are ruining the health of women. High heels are breaking down the arches; with narrow skirts, girls don't walk, they wiggle. Calsomined faces hide pasty complexions, sleazy near-silk stockings invite pneumonia in competition with sheer low-cut waists and iron-clad corsets that restrict lung action."

Makes Hens Moult Fast

I would not be without "More Eggs" if it cost $10 a package. It has hurried the moult for me and all my hens are now laying their full capacity.
JOE MARTIN, West Plains, Mo.

"Finishes Moult—Lays Quick"

I used E. J. Reefer's "More Eggs" Tonic and I know it did my old hens good, for as they got through moulting they began laying. Please rush me a supply.
Yours respectfully,
H. G. McCALL, Williamsburg, Pa.

First Time Hens Laid During Moult

I have used your "More Eggs" Tonic since last fall and can surely say it has amply paid me. I have had chickens for 7 years and this is the first time they have ever laid through their moulting season. MRS. C. LUGINBUHL, Norwood, Ohio.

Loafers Before, Layers Now

My hens have laid through moulting this year. It is the first time since I had chickens. They have always been loafers until I used "More Eggs", now they are good layers.
MRS. H. J. SCHULZE, Pittsburgh, Kans.

Gets Eggs All Year

Have several friends that wish to use your "More Eggs" Tonic after seeing that I have been so successful in getting eggs all through the year and moulting season.
MRS. J. MEDARIS, Dale, Texas.

24 Eggs a Day During Moulting

Your "More Eggs" Tonic certainly puts hens in good condition for laying. I had 175 hens that were moulting and I began feeding them your Tonic and got nearly 2 doz. eggs a day.
S. J. FRANKENBERGER, Loganton, Penn.

$200 Worth of Eggs from 44 Hens

I never used "More Eggs" Tonic until last December; then just used one $1.00 package and have sold over $200 worth of eggs from 44 hens. "More Eggs" Tonic did it.

BY KATE V. SAINT MAUR.

Work That Should Not Be Delayed.

THE fall is a very important time in the poultry world, as it is the pivot on which the winter's success balances. Neglect of any sort at this crucial time will invariably affect the supply of winter eggs, on which the real profit of the year depends. Poultry houses must be put into thorough repair and sanitary condition before the first of October, so that the birds may be placed in their winter quarters and not again disturbed.

It is my own custom to go over all the buildings in the chicken yard, mend any cracks or holes which may be found, and paint the roofs with liquid tar. The floors are scraped out to a depth of two or three inches, perches and nest boxes taken out, and the whole interior given a coat of hot whitewash. To make the whitewash, three quarts of fresh lime are placed in a pail and just covered with hot water. When the mixture commences to boil, it is stirred until the lumps are dissolved, and as it thickens, boiling skim-milk is added until it is of the consistency of cream. Lastly, a cupful of crude carbolic acid, a pound of whiting and a half pound of powdered glue are mixed in. This makes a wash which sticks almost as well as paint, and which, when applied hot, most effectually banishes vermin.

Cleaning a poultry house is a task which must not be done in a slipshod way. Before whitewashing the walls, floor and ceiling with a brush, if you have a garden spray, fill it full of the liquid mixture, and apply it to all the corners, kinks and crevices, for they are the places which harbor vermin, and cannot be reached with an ordinary brush.

When the whitewashing is all done and has had time to dry, the floors are covered with fresh lime, which burns out all the impurities, and, after a few hours, dry soil or sand is filled in to the depth of two or three inches. Windows are cleaned, inside and out, so that the sun may have free access; perches and nest boxes are thoroughly scrubbed with kerosene, whitewashed and replaced. When all this is accomplished, the biddies' home is sweet and wholesome.

I try to finish all this work before the fifteenth of the month, so that there will be no delay in getting the hens into their winter quarters. Any change of houses after pullets have once commenced to lay, invariably stops them, and should cold weather start in before they have regained their equilibrium, much time may be wasted.

Vermin are disagreeable enemies against which the poultry keeper must maintain a perpetual war. A good liquid exterminator is made by dissolving crude naphtha flakes in kerosene oil, using just as much of the flakes as will dissolve in any given quantity of oil. Paint the roofs, nest boxes, and any supports or frames about the house with the mixture. It does not take very long to do the work. Half an hour every Saturday will increase the birds' comfort and your profit.

Powder to use on the birds can be made for a few cents. Mix thoroughly, equal parts of finely-sifted coal ashes and tobacco dust, and moisten with the liquid exterminator. Allow it to dry, and put away in cans for ready use. Tobacco dust can be bought at most florists, and at all seed stores for twelve cents a pound. An empty baking-powder tin, with some holes pierced at one end, makes a good dredger.

The birds should be dusted with the powder before being placed in a clean house. Hold the hen by the feet, head downwards, and shake the powder well into the feathers. Use plenty of it, and with your hand rub it down into the fluffy part of the feathers near the skin, and especially near the tail on the body, and under the wings. If you have not been using any such precautions, or when you buy new birds, you ought to go over them every other night for a week. This will make it an easy matter to keep them free from the various vermin pests which seem to have been specially created for the undoing of poultry keepers.

My winter houses are one hundred feet long, twelve feet wide, and are divided into eight compartments, into each of which I put twenty-five layers. This gives them plenty of room for exercise, even when heavy snows necessitate keeping them shut up for days and weeks at a time.

If you have pullets and year-old hens, to secure the best results they should be kept in separate coops, as they require a different amount of feed. If you do not have a sufficient number of houses, it would be an easy matter to run a wire partition through the middle of one house, and so make two compartments.

I spend much of my time at this season of the year watching my hens, both old and young. I don't believe in keeping unprofitable birds through the winter, and birds which look mopy are consigned to the fattening pen. Even slow, dull-looking pullets are rejected, as I want only bright, energetic birds in the laying houses.

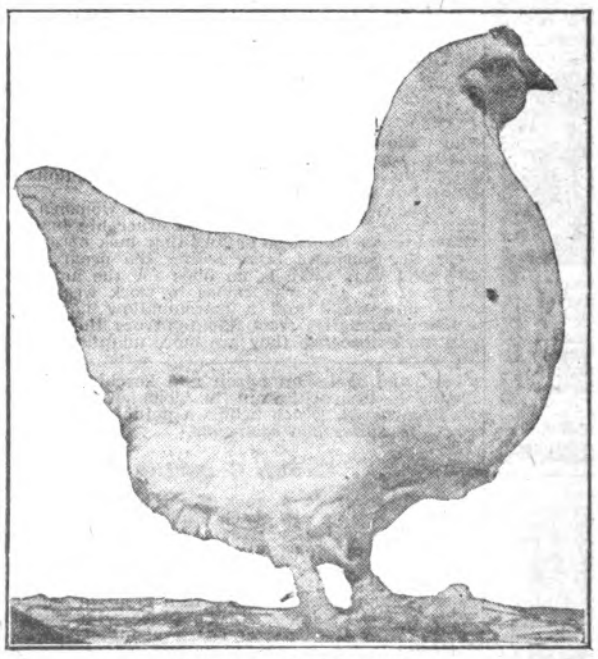
Lazy hens, although they do not produce eggs fatten easily, and bring as good a price as roosters. Close weeding out of unprofitable birds is really more than half the secret of success, and should be rigidly practiced.

Roosters are not allowed with the hens whose eggs are sold in the market, as infertile eggs are nicer for the table, and will keep fresh longer than fertile eggs. All the male birds are kept in one house and yard, so that they will become friendly and will not fight when distributed.

Hens intended to produce eggs for hatching are allowed free range until November; then they are divided into flocks of twenty-five, and four males are assigned to each flock, two being kept in a coop, two put with the flock, the pairs changing places every week. This prevents favoritism, which is the usual cause of infertile eggs. I make up my flocks in November, because I start the incubators in December, and like to have the birds running together for three weeks before using the eggs for incubation.

Exercise is of primary importance in the life of the laying hen, and every means should be taken to promote activity. The most natural way to do this is to provide a heavier covering of litter on the floor and to scatter small grain broadcast over this once a day, for the birds will scratch in it for hours at a time.

Straw or hay will answer the purpose, but both cost money and take time to cut; so, in October and November, before snow falls, we go into the plantation at the back of the barn and rake up the fallen leaves, placing them in bags and storing them in a shed near the poultry house. Twice a week, all through a bad winter, a bag is emptied into each compartment. The birds delight to work and scratch among them, which keeps them busy, and also breaks up and converts the leaves into fertilizer for spring use in the garden.



Buy Some Good Birds Now to Improve Your Stock

I want our readers to make a special effort and try to buy cockerels now to head their breeding pens next season, for this is the season of the year when the big breeders of thoroughbred stock commence to select their birds for the show season, and put them into separate coops to develop, take the young pullets off free range, and place them in permanent winter quarters and cull out the year-old birds, and divide them into flocks for next year's breeding pens. All this means that house room becomes so precious that they are willing—nay, anxious, to dispose of extra cockerels, and will sell good birds now for about half what they would ask for them in the spring. Such a golden opportunity should not be neglected, and I advise you to sell off all your old hens or your own young cockerels and use the money for the purchase of one or two really good birds, for if you have only mediumly fair stock, and mate a few of the hens to a good bird next spring, you are sure to get some youngsters who will more than pay you for your trouble. Look through the advertising columns for the addresses of well-known breeders of whatever variety you are breeding, and write them for prices of cockerels; or, better still, quote what price you can afford to pay; remembering always that you can't expect to get something for nothing, and that even a cull bird from a breeder who has for years kept nothing but full-blooded stock, is of more value to breed from than a splendid looking bird which may have all sorts of mixed and poor varieties among his ancestors. For, as I have explained to you, the individual bird or animal is not half so important as his parents and grandparents, as far as his influence is concerned on future stock.

When writing to breeders about cockerels, you should give a clear description of the hens you want to mate him to, because the breeder will then be able to select a bird, with such characteristics as will counterbalance the weak points in your birds.

To illustrate: If the hens happen to have legs rather too long for the breed they belong to, the male bird chosen to mate with them should have legs a trifle short, and, of course, the same throughout the points. There are very few perfect birds, so matings must be arranged to counterbalance the faulty points. And it is impossible to get perfection from one mating, so it is positively necessary to breed the pullets back to the sire, even to the third and fourth generation.

Now, many people run away with the idea that it is only conformation and plumage that one does such mating for, but it is quite as necessary when one is trying to build up a strain of heavy laying birds. Roosters must be the offspring of prolific layers, no less than the hens to which they are mated, and it is only by remating to the progeny of the original sire that the breed can be firmly established. Of course, the same is to be said if your ambition is to raise specially good table birds with deep breasts and heavily-meated thighs. So you see, even for the general-purpose bird, it is well to devote some thought to the subject, and be careful not only to select hens that are known to be good layers, but males that are known to be the sons of heavy layers; and once having established a good pen, it is well to be very careful how you introduce a strange male bird.

WHITE WYANDOTTE HEN.

I am emphasizing this subject now, because so many of my correspondents seem to be convinced that all there is to get good layers is to select their best hens. I use "hens" in writing, but of course the same principles apply to ducks and geese, and, to a smaller extent, turkeys. It is quite time to consider breeding flocks of ducks and geese now, for if strange birds have to be bought, it takes time for them to become accustomed to their new surroundings, and, as they are early layers, there should be no delay about the purchase.

Both ducks and geese are such easy keepers when they have a wide range that it is advisable for every small farm to keep a flock of either one or the other. Imperial Pekin ducks start laying in January, when hens' eggs are bringing very big prices, so the ducks' eggs are a great convenience and economy, as they can be used at home, and usually sell to neighbors for cooking purposes, even if they don't like to eat them. Ducks' eggs make better cakes and custards than hens' eggs, and people who are living near towns or cities can always dispose of any surplus quantity to confectioners and candymakers.

I give you this hint, as it is not advisable to hatch ducks before April in most localities, and by that time hens' eggs have gone down in price so that one does not mind using them in the kitchen. If you have raised any number of ducks or geese during the last season, now is the time to fatten and market them. Confine them in rather small yards; boil and mash any waste, green vegetables, small potatoes, and any other root crop that you may have on hand. When cool, mix about a quart of wheat middlings or corn-meal through a panful, and you will have a good fattening mash for twenty birds, and give them all the skim-milk you can spare in a dish they can only get their bills into, and they will be ready for market within three weeks.

Old ducks and geese which are to be kept for breeding in the spring, must have a dry place to sleep in, and good feed. Chopped corn-stalks or fodder, well steamed, and a little bran, make a good, inexpensive mash. If skim-milk is plentiful, give them some every day, to take the place of insects which they can no longer find for themselves. If there is no milk to spare, get some commercial meat scraps, and mix about a tablespoonful for each bird in a mash three times a week. Also, be careful that they get plenty of grit and water. Ducks and geese often suffer for water on a general farm after outdoor pools and troughs are frozen.

The care the birds receive now will influence their laying and the strength of the ducklings and goslings next spring. Don't lose any time in getting your young pullets into winter quarters. The sooner they are settled and winter rations started, the sooner they will commence to lay. Don't forget that, to produce eggs, they must have plenty of water to drink, and, as they have no teeth, need grit to grind the food after it passes into the gizzard—animal food, vegetables, and lime in some form. Brooks and outside drinking troughs are sure to be frozen, small stone and sand ditto. So when the farmer throws down the corn, which is greedily eaten, the hen profits little, for she cannot digest it properly, and, in consequence, is unprofitable. Insects (the natural animal food supply) are not to be had, nor is there any vegetable matter available. So the fowls return to natural conditions, which means no eggs until springtime, when they are again able to find the different ingredients from which eggs are formed.

Turkeys

I want to give you a few hints about the care of the old turkeys at this season of the year, in the hope that it may help in raising young ones in the spring, for during the past few years the number of letters telling about the loss of young turkeys in all parts of the country has been positively appalling, and it all springs from an intestinal disease commonly called "blackhead," which is spread through the droppings of infected birds. For this reason I want you to do a little doctoring right now to get the old birds in good condition if possible.

First of all, plow the yards or grounds where the turkeys have been in the habit of congregating and thoroughly disinfect the roosts or fences which they frequent; then once every week put forty grains of Epsom salts in half-a-pint of water, and place it where the birds are likely to drink from it in the early morning. And before you give them their feed in the morning, mix one grain of sulphate of iron and one grain of silicate of soda and make it into a pill with a little curd cheese or bread which has been moistened with milk. The above amount is for one pill, and each bird should get one of these. At night, again try to force them to drink the water with Epsom salts in it. Or if you only have two or three birds which are pretty tame and easily handled, give them a teaspoonful of castor oil night and morning instead of the salts. Sweep up and burn all the droppings from under the roosts as early as possible in the morning. Repeat this treatment once a week for four weeks. After that time, add seven grains of catechu to every two quarts of drinking water every day for another month. After the first of the year, give the turkeys some of the laying hen's mash every morning, and all through the winter give them a good feed of corn at night.

I. D.—We have no stock nor eggs for sale. The price of eggs for setting varies, but you should be able to get eggs from pure bred birds for about three dollars a setting. Eggs from prize-winning stock, however, would range from five to twenty-five dollars a setting.

J. McK.—Perhaps you fed the chickens too heavily, or had the brooder too hot. Chicks must have plenty of exercise and fresh air. I think the chicks must have had some contagious disease, even if you did not notice any symptoms, as so many of them died. Feathering out quickly is generally a sign of strong, healthy chicks. But perhaps you mean that they only got their wing feathers quickly, which would indicate that the birds were weak, or had been forced too quickly.

L. P. M.—Please read answer to I. D. in this issue.

W. D. C.—From your description I should think the rooster had something in his throat, or perhaps sour crop. Without more knowledge of the case I can only suggest that you give him a tablespoon of castor oil every third night until he has had three doses, and feed lightly on mash. The oil cannot do any harm, and if there is no lodgment in the throat or crop it may remove it. At the same time spray throat and nostrils twice a day with permanganate of potassium.

E. E. M.—The birds have tuberculosis, which is a chronic and contagious disease characterized by the development of nodules called tubercles in various organs of the body, but most frequently in the liver, spleen and intestines. Tuberculosis is generally brought into the poultry yard with fowls that are purchased from infected flocks or with the eggs of diseased birds that are obtained for the purpose of hatching. If the disease exists in neighboring flocks, the contagion may be carried by small birds or animals passing from one yard to the other. A peculiarity of the tuberculosis of birds is that the liver and intestines are nearly always very severely affected, and that as a consequence the bacilli are very numerous in the intestinal contents and are scattered with the droppings everywhere that the fowls go. The introduction of a single diseased bird may, therefore, cause the infection of the greater part of the flock in a few weeks. In the same way, when wild birds contract the disease, the bacilli are carried and deposited in all the yards which they visit. The eggs of diseased birds frequently contain the bacilli, as has been proven by the inoculation of and the transference of the disease to rabbits and guinea pigs. The young chicks hatched from such infected eggs are diseased when they leave the shell, and, of course, soon infect the poultry with which they run. Moreover, since the sterile incubated eggs are often fed to chickens, it is clear that even the eggs which do not hatch may introduce the contagion unless they are cooked before feeding. Pigs, cats, rats and mice are especially liable to be infected with fowl tuberculosis from eating the carcasses of birds which have died, and these animals serve to keep up the contagion and may communicate it to other fowls. Even calves and colts are sometimes found suffering from this form of tuberculosis. Symptoms are not generally observed in the internal tuberculosis of fowls until the disease has reached an advanced stage of development. They begin with gradual loss of weight, wasting of the muscles, paleness of the comb, and toward the end, dullness, sleepiness and diarrhea. Very often there is at the same time a tubercular inflammation of the joints and of the sheaths of tendons, which is revealed by lameness, swelling of the joints of the legs, and sometimes by the formation of hard, external tumors of considerable size. Occasionally the skin over the swollen joints breaks, the interior of the joint is ulcerated, and a small quantity of pus, containing large numbers of tubercle bacilli, is discharged. Swellings and bony enlargements of the joints with fowls are invariably suspicious, and their nature should always be investigated by killing the bird and examining the liver and spleen to determine if these have any whitish or yellowish spots on their surface which when cut into prove to be tubercular masses. There is no treatment that will cure fowls which have been attacked with tuberculosis. When the disease is discovered, the effort should be to eradicate it at once by killing off the whole flock and thoroughly disinfecting all the houses and runs. As the great majority of the birds will probably be more or less affected, the chances are that any which are saved will have diseased livers and intestines, from which the bacilli will escape and keep up the infection of the flock and the runs. The danger of this is so great that no attempt should be made to keep any of the fowls that have been exposed to the contagion, no matter how valuable they may be. The bodies of the birds which have died or are killed, as well as all the accumulated manure, sweepings and scrapings of the poultry houses, should be completely destroyed by fire.

R. M.—This case looks like poison of some sort; the hens being let out for a short time in the evening, and being so ravenous for green stuff and insects, indicates that they will pick up anything. Have your neighbors been using a poison spray on fruit trees or potatoes? In such cases it is always advisable to give each bird a dose of castor oil, and use milk instead of water to drink. If your young birds seem all right, leave them on free range all the time. They will grow and develop much better than they would in yards.

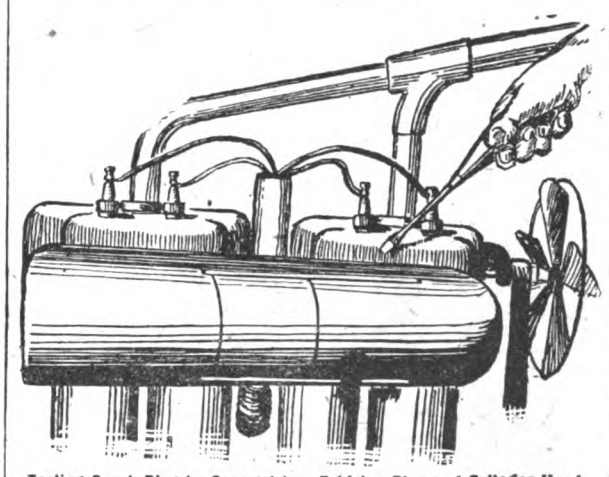
Automobile and Gas Engine Helps



Questions relating to gasolene engines and automobiles, by our subscribers, addressed to COMFORT Auto Dept., Augusta, Maine, will be answered by our expert, free, in the columns of this department. Full name and address is required, but initials only will be printed. That we may intelligently diagnose your trouble please state the year in which your car was made.

When the Engine Goes "Dead"

THERE is an old anxiom which reads as follows: "There is a reason for everything." There are times when the automobile goes "dead," and invariably the owner will turn every adjustment within his reach in an effort to get the car started. There is no sense to such proceedure and when the car goes suddenly "dead," there is a systematic course for locating the trouble. It is safe to assume that 99 times out of the 100 the trouble can be located in the gasolene or ignition systems. If the car has been running along smoothly and suddenly stops, it is only reasonable to assume that either the gasolene is not reaching the cylinders or that the ignition current has failed.

A sticking valve or broken spark plug will cause a miss for one particular cylinder, but the engine will continue to run.

Let us assume that we are driving, the engine hitting on all cylinders, when suddenly it quits cold. There are no loud reports and the engine stops just as if the ignition switch was turned off. The chances are that the ignition current has failed. Before leaving the driver's seat, turn on the lights and if they burn, it would indicate that the storage battery is O. K. However, if the lights do not burn, then you should instantly direct your attention to the storage battery. A storage battery will deliver sufficient current for ignition purposes long after it is too weak to take care of the lights. Nevertheless, bridge the negative and positive terminals with the pliers and if there is no flashing of sparks, it is safe to assume that the battery is dead and requires replacing or recharging.

Now, we will take the opposite condition. The lights burn when switched on, and so we know instantly that there is current. If you have anyone with you in the car, have him turn the motor over with the electric starter or hand-crank while you hold the end of the cable which connects to a spark plug about a sixteenth of an inch from the cylinder casting. If a spark does not jump the gap when the engine is turned over with the ignition switch on, you should look for loose terminals and bare wires. In other words, you must direct your entire attention to correcting the condition which prevents the current from reaching the spark plugs.

There is another condition, the backfiring through the muffler and carburetor before the engine stops. The trouble, when accompanied by the above symptoms, is usually due to lack of gasolene. The first step is, of course, to determine that there is gasolene in the storage tank. Having made certain that there is sufficient fuel, try to flood the carburetor by pressing down on the primer plunger. If the carburetor floods readily, the indications are that a shortage of gasolene is not the trouble and it will be well to look for a short circuit in the wiring.

However, if the carburetor floods after holding the primer plunger down for some time, it would indicate that there is a stoppage in the gasolene line and that the motor is consuming the gasolene faster than it is being fed to the carburetor. The remedy is to clean out the gasolene pipe.

Providing the carburetor does not flood, make certain that the shut-offs have not jarred closed and then determine whether the vacuum tank is operating properly. If there is no gasolene in the vacuum tank, the tank mechanism and connections should be carefully inspected. You will probably find instructions which clearly describe the operating principle of the vacuum tank and will experienee no difficulty in checking up the mechanism.

The chief factor to bear in mind is that the trouble is undoubtedly due to a slight irregularity, either in the gasolene or ignition system, and, therefore, do not proceed to alter adjustments until you have located the cause.

Useful Pointers

Sticking Pistons

It is not an uncommon occurrence for the pistons in a motor which has stood idle for a long time to become "frozen" to the cylinder walls. In many cases the sticking pistons cannot be set free by pressure applied with the hand crank at the front end of the crank-shaft. The best proceedure known to the writer is to drain the cooling system and refill with warm water so as to cause the cylinder walls to expand a trifle. Remove the spark plugs and squirt gasolene through the openings. The gasolene will find its way between the pistons and the cylinder walls. Jack up a rear wheel so that it is free from the floor, engage the high gear, and apply considerable power to the jacked wheel by first turning forward and then backward; the pistons should break away. Before running the motor on its own power, inject thin lubricating oil through the spark plug openings so as to insure the lubrication of the cylinder walls.

Rail-Riding Tires

The smooth street car rails often appeal to a motorist, especially if by riding upon them he can escape a stretch of rough road. While it cannot be denied that riding the rails often adds considerable to the comfort of the passengers, yet if the owner is endeavoring to operate his car at a minimum expense, it must be pointed out that rail-riding has its effect on tires. Tires are constructed for the weight of the machine to be borne by the tread. However, when the car is run in the car tracks, the weight of the car falls to the side of the tires. This practice causes the plies of fabric to separate and the tread to loosen. Car tracks many times present razor edges, and more than one tire has been torn by running on a switch.

Inflating Tube

The B. F. Goodrich Rubber Co. advises that a tube should never be placed on the ground or floor when partially inflating it before insertion in the casing. This practice allows the tube to pick up particles of sand, cinders and oil which create friction and eventually tiny holes.

The right way is to place the tube over the left shoulder and pump with the right hand. Thus no portion of the tube will be allowed to touch the road or pavement. When the tube is well rounded with the air and free from wrinkles, it is ready for insertion in the casing, and then should be pumped to the prescribed pressure.

Road Commandments

The following rules for automobilists have been presented by the National Council of Industrial Safety:

1. Be considerate.
2. Go slow; first, passing children; second, passing vehicles; third, approaching crossings; fourth, turning corners.
3. Stop first at railroad crossings; second, behind standing street cars.
4. Use chain on slippery pavements.
5. When in doubt go slow or stop.

The council further requests all automobilists to obey to the letter these nine commandments of the road:

Don't run fast into or across main highways.
Don't take blind curves too fast.
Don't run on the wrong side of the road.
Don't pass street cars when passengers are boarding or leaving.
Don't fail to sound your horn before passing other vehicles.
Don't forget that a car or person may be just around the turn.
Don't forget that the other fellow may be dull, reckless or drunk.
Don't fail to look out for pedestrians.
Don't forget that children dash in the way unexpectedly.
Don't take chances. That's the simple embracing rule.

Gasolene Facts

U. S. Geographical Survey reports: 7,629,000,000 barrels of oil still in U. S. fields —enough for 20 years at present consumption rate. World's deposit, 60,000,000,000 barrels —enough for 168 years.

U. S. Bureau of Mines reports:
Reserve gasolene stocks in March reached 626,393,046 gallons, an increase in 30 days of 80,330,617 gallons.
Total production of gasolene in 1919: 3,957,857,097 gallons.

Henry L. Doherty says:
There'll be gasolene for us, for our children and our children's children.

New Ideas in Agriculture

AS the readers of COMFORT are well aware, the scientists in the various agricultural experiment stations are busy all of the time hunting for new plants, and facts relative to farming, livestock breeding, feeding, management, dairy farming, horticulture and all kindred subjects. It is our aim to give readers of this journal the benefit of scientific research from time to time as discoveries and conclusions are made public. This, to the busy farmer, should be of great assistance and value, but in addition, those who have time should have their names and addresses placed upon the mailing lists of the experiment stations of their respective states, so that they may be able to read more fully the "literature" particularly applicable to the districts in which they live and farm. We shall continue this service and try to make it even more effective than heretofore.

Combating Potato Bugs

Professor Milward of the Wisconsin station advises that arsenate of zinc used at the rate of two pounds to 50 gallons of water will give good results as a poison for the pestiferous potato beetle. It should be applied immediately after the eggs hatch, when the bugs are small. Hot, damp weather is bad bug weather. The young bugs are found in clusters on the upper parts of the plants. In such weather, poisons applied to kill bugs are most liable to burn the plants. Apply the poison solution by use of coarse nozzles. Completely wet down every portion of the young plants. Make two or three applications at close intervals. The best grades of potato spraying machinery should be used to give effective results. A machine that will serve for spraying against bugs early in the season at light pressure and later for leaf blight at high pressure is particularly desirable. Hand atomizers, knapsack sprayers and power outfits are types of machinery that are available and fit the needs of everyone, from the truck gardener to the commercial potato grower.

Poisoning Grasshoppers

Entomologists of the Wisconsin station advise poisoning as the only way of controlling the grasshopper situation. They advise to scatter bran mash over the fields early in the morning, using five to seven pounds to the acre. The poison bait is made by mixing together 50 pounds of bran, alfalfa meal, or middlings, two pounds of Paris green or white arsenic and two pounds of salt. Then take one ounce of the cheapest lemon extract and pour into a bucket of water. Stir this mixture into the bran poison, adding more water until the bran becomes thoroughly moistened and crumbly. Scatter broadcast over the infested field early in the morning while the dew is on the grass. Stock should of course be kept off the treated fields, and poultry also.

Killing Dandelions on Lawns

Experiments made at the New York station during the past eight years show that dandelions may be eradicated from lawns by proper spraying with a solution of one and one half to two pounds of sulphate of iron (also known as copperas or green vitriol) to the gallon of water. A gallon of the solution will suffice for 375 square feet and 175 pounds of the sulphate will do for one acre. Apply in form of fine mist sprayed well into the foliage. A compressed air spray, knapsack sprayer or similar apparatus will suffice. Strain the solution through a fine strainer or two thicknesses of cheese-cloth. Keep the spray from wetting clothing, sidewalks, building foundations, monuments, curbstones, etc., as it stains badly. Give the first treatment when flower buds are seen, but before they blossom. Follow with treatments at three or four week intervals during the spring growing season and one or two others in late summer or autumn. Fertilization of the lawn and frequent reseeding also is advised.

Success with Milking Machines

Observations at the New York station indicate that the methods of cleaning are more important than the type of milker in determining the germ content of milk and that high-grade milk can be produced with the milkers, provided they are cleansed and cared for twice a day for 365 days in the year by methods known to give the best results. This means rapid but careful washing of the machines by drawing successive pails of cold water, hot alkali water, and clear hot water through them immediately after each milking; immersion of the teat-cups and all rubber parts in a good sterilizing solution between milkings, supplemented by a very thorough weekly overhauling of the teat-cups and tubes; and daily scalding and thorough drying of all the metal parts that come in contact with the milk, except those parts kept in the sterilizing solution. The solutions referred to usually are prescribed by the maker of each type of milking machine.

Sunflowers Silage

On the Michigan experiment station farm a three-acre strip of sunflowers produced 30 per cent greater tonnage than an equal area of corn adjacent. These sunflowers were put in one of the dairy silos with corn silage above and below and the silage fed out to the dairy herd during the winter. Sunflower silage was found to be very dark colored, and has a strong odor and some of the cows refused it entirely on the start, while others ate it readily. As soon as they became accustomed to the sunflower silage they were fed the same amounts by weight as they received of the corn silage. When the herd changed from corn silage to sunflower silage a marked drop in milk flow was apparent and the cows began to lose condition rapidly. The feeding of clear sunflower silage was continued for 12 days, when it was thought best to make a change and the balance of the sunflower silage was fed with an equal weight of corn silage, after which the herd was fed straight corn silage. The grain and hay ration remained the same throughout different periods. The results are summed up as follows: Milk-flow dropped 11.65 per cent during the seven-day period on sunflower silage but recovered noticeably when corn and corn silage were fed in equal parts, dropping again when the herd changed back to straight corn silage. In the feeding trial, sunflower silage compared very unfavorably with corn silage. However, a drop in milk-flow when the cows were changed from mixed corn and sunflower silage to clear corn silage, would indicate that the mixture may be preferable to straight corn silage and work along this line will be continued during the present season.

Spray Sheep Against Gad-Flies

The Iowa station advises that sheep may be successfully sprayed during summer to keep them free from gad-flies which produce grubs that work their way into the upper passages and sinuses of the head, by way of the nostrils, and cause great distress and damage to the sheep. "The best way to fight the pest," says Dr. Stouder, "is to spray the head of the sheep with fly repellents or to place some good fly-chaser remedy near the salt-lick so that the sheep when going to get salt, will rub it with their noses and apply it themselves. The best cure is to prevent the pest from getting to the sheep, since they are hard to get out of the animal's head once they get there." The sheep gad-fly is a yellowish grey fly with brown hairs, about the size of a common house-fly. It is very active during the mid-day and causes the sheep to crowd together as it tries to get into their nostrils to deposit its embryo grubs or larvæ.

Sawdust as Cow Feed

What next? The Wisconsin station, collaborating with the United States Department of Agriculture, has successfully fed dairy cows upon sawdust treated by a new process perfected by Dr. E. C. Sherrard of the Government Forest Products Laboratory at Madison. Professor Morrison of the agricultural experiment station there has done the feeding work. He says that "sensational reports circulating to the effect that the saving in feed will be enormous and that the use of sawdust will revolutionize the dairy industry are false and misleading. No one," he adds, "can state whether or not it will prove of practical application." It would seem that cattle may be fed a limited amount of the new hydrolized sawdust. As a feed it contains only a negligible amount of protein and for that reason cannot be compared with barley. In both experiment rations fed at the station the protein was furnished by other feeds. Before attempting the manufacture of this new feed on a commercial scale it will be necessary to carry on much longer feeding tests to find out whether the sawdust has any injurious effects when its use is long continued. It seems likely, however, that in time scientists may perfect profitable feeding stuffs from sawdust and other now wasted materials.

The "Fat of the Land"

We often hear the expression that such and such a person is living off the "fat of the land," and generally it refers to some wealthy person who is able to buy the luxuries that a well-filled purse is able to pay for.

As a matter of fact, to trace the expression back to its source, it means the best the land or soil can be made to produce for the material sustenance of man. This being true, then every reasonably successful farmer can be living off "the fat of the land" if he is willing to put his time and effort to that effect.

Many farmers give too little time and attention to provide for the raising of the many special crops which make the difference between a real luxury in diet and an everyday sameness which no man can work his best upon, and which the family tolerate because they must. A farmer's living, or what he eats, can and should be of the best. In fact, he can have as much or better than a successful business man is able to buy. The only thing necessary is the thought and willingness to produce it.

The wife is too often expected by some hook or crook, or some trick of legerdemain, to "set a good table" and provide good, nourishing meals out of nothing. Too many farm women are at their wit's end to know how to place before their family an appetizing variety.

The Farm Garden

The farm garden is too often turned over to the wife for her to produce and do all the heavy back-breaking labor but the first plowing. All the busy farm wife should do about the garden is to help plant it and oversee its cultivation. A farm garden that has the necessary variety of vegetables and the proper successive plantings of all season crops, is too big and requires too much hand labor for any woman to attempt. The farm garden should be planted in rows and everything as far as possible cultivated like any other farm crop, by horse power. Too many times the farmer thinks that beets, carrots, turnips, parsnips and the other common vegetables is about all there is to a garden. For such a farmer a good, up-to-date reliable garden book will afford some mighty interesting reading. How much celery, head lettuce, asparagus, Brussels sprouts, cauliflower, kohlrabi, salsify, is found in the average farm garden?

Dairy Products

Suppose for the sake of argument the farm has a good vegetable garden of excellent varieties and of great abundance.

It must be remembered that some vegetables to be nourishing and appetizing need good whole milk, cream and butter to combine with them to be really satisfying and wholesome. A farm that is any farm at all need not stint on these necessities. A man need not be a dairy farmer to let his family have all the milk, butter and cream it can use. A family cow or two will supply an abundance and there is no food that can take the place of milk and milk products.

Orchard

There is no work that gives better returns than that spent on an orchard or fruit garden. One of the best crops a farmer raises is his fruit crop. A good big orchard of all the varieties of fruit his locality can produce is a wonderful money saver. In connection with the orchard should be a garden of small fruits—blackberries, gooseberries, grapes, currants, strawberries—in fact every kind of small fruit that it is possible for him to raise. It doesn't take much imagination to picture well-filled storehouse shelves of sauces, jellies and preserves that fairly make the mouth water as a result of a good orchard and fruit garden.

Meat

No farm table should be limited to fresh meat at butchering time and salt pork the rest of the year excepting when an occasional trip to town brings home a little fresh meat.

The farmer should have the very best of meat and he can if he puts thought and well-directed effort in it. He should make a study of the curing of hams and bacon, making and keeping of sausage, drying of beef, canning of beef and chicken, and so on 'til his meat supply is equal to that of his vegetables and fruit.

TO the girls expressing a desire to "do something worth while," the best advice I can give you is embodied in the verse quoted below. I'm particularly fond of the line, "Find thy mission on the earth and leave the stars to light the skies." We are so apt to want to assist the stars to "light the skies" that we let the humble, everyday tasks pass by unnoticed. the humble, everyday tasks pass by unnoticed. —Ed.

"Do a little good in passing, sow some kindness every day,
Stretch a hand to help a struggler who has fallen by the way.
Flash a smile to cheer the mourner, plant a flower to bud and bloom,
Loose a ray of sympathy to pierce with sunlight the thick gloom;
Stop and counsel with the erring, help the fallen one to rise,
Find thy mission on the earth and leave the stars to light the skies;
Whisper comfort to the sobbing, let the sunshine struggle through,
And when Heaven's portals open there will be a place for you."

L. and J., Nebraska.—Is it proper for a girl to "dispose of" her little brothers and sisters when a young man calls on her? You sound as though you were speaking of kittens and intended to put them in a bag with some rocks and—but why go into murderous details? I've seen some little brothers and sisters that I thought a temporary drowning would benefit but maybe you'd better spare yours a while longer. Don't shoo them out first thing. Let them stay a little while and then have your mother send them to bed or "dispose of" them in some way. Mothers should understand such things without being told. (2) In days of old when knights were bold it would have been the proper thing for a man to lay down his coat a la Raleigh for his lady fair to walk upon, but in these days of $75.00 suits he would be very foolish to do that when he might carry her across a muddy place. A shoe shine costs only ten cents. I'll answer the rest of your questions some other time.

BROWN-EYED ELLA, California.—If I were a young girl of twenty, a man of forty would have to possess more material wealth than three horses and nine dogs before I'd think of marrying him. As you say, dogs make nice pets but you can't live with them. A man of that age, if he has spent his time and money wisely, should have a home to offer a girl. There was some talk a while ago of changing the calendar so as to make thirteen months and I think you'd better wait and select that month for your marriage.

MARY, N. C.—Why ask me for advice when you've got it all settled that you are to be married in September? If your father and mother approve of the man of your choice then I don't see as I can say anything unless I object on the grounds that you are too young to marry anyone. May all happiness be yours.

E. L. M., Ill.—He is a selfish person and an education will be worth more to you than six like him; in fact, selfish, dishonorable men, such as he has shown himself to be, should be tied in bunches and sold for six-for-a-quarter, though it would be a waste of money to buy them. Now I suppose you'll be cross and marry him just for spite; but you wanted my opinion and I have given it to you straight from the shoulder.

POSEY, Georgia.—Men aren't the shy creatures you picture them, and if he loves you, as you think he does, he won't try to keep you from knowing it. There's really nothing you can do to show your love for him any more than being sort of friendly-nice to him.

MRS. J. J. V., Montana.—A few months ago I made some flippant remark regarding correspondence school nurses and now one of them comes back at me with a very diplomatic call-down and tells me that practical nurses would do well to take a correspondence school course and that such a course would be of inestimable worth to mothers. 'Tis true, Mrs. V., and I'll take back all I said, only I reserve the right to hand my precious insides over to a regular honest-to-goodness trained nurse for inspection and repairs, or rather to assist the surgeon. Of course there are a great many cases where they can give as intelligent care as a trained nurse and maybe a t. n. could learn something from them.

PUZZLED GIRLIE, Michigan.—Your girl friend should have asked your consent before sending your name to a boy she didn't know, and your mother is right in refusing to allow you to correspond with him. It would be proper to write a letter of explanation, telling him the truth, and if he is the right sort he will respect you all the more for it, and if he isn't you don't want to correspond with him anyway.

SALTED ALMONDS, Okla.—You aren't more than a pound or two over weight; not enough to worry about. You are right in classing boys as "forbidden fruit"—particularly mushy ones. Why not study as much as possible instead of as little as possible. You are cheating yourself, and a person who does that is my idea of the biggest simpleton.

HILDA, N. C.—To live up to the advice given in the poem you should "stop and counsel with the erring, help the fallen ones to rise," but to do that doesn't mean that you must consider yourself engaged to a man who gets drunk. Don't drag yourself down to help him. Be kindly encouraging but not hopeful of anything more until he can present a new set of morals for your inspection with proper attention paid to the 18th Amendment.

MICKEY, Ga.—It is the custom in certain foreign countries for a girl to have a well-filled hope chest before becoming engaged, even. In fact, I believe there is a certain country where the girl is supposed to have enough underwear to last an ordinary lifetime—not only for herself but for her future husband, though that seems a rather indelicate subject, and, besides, how does she know they'll fit? All this, of course, in addition to household linen, etc. The majority of girls become engaged before they have hope chests. They aren't as popular as they were in our grandmothers' day, but they are mighty nice to have.

There, that's enough advice for one dose. Repeat, if necessary.

ever, she promised "never, no, never again," to write to me and wouldn't have them only to tell me how "very, very unkind I was," etc., etc. I've written her a letter of apology but please don't add to Clarence Beam's burdens by any such wail of woe. If you really want to hear from him, a check or money-order for some of his work will bring you a reply.—Ed.

Ways of Doing Things Around the Home

To remove ring from swollen finger, dip in the finger in ice-cold soapsuds.

Raw potato juice will remove stains from the hands; also from woolen fabrics.

To brighten spoons and other silver, let them stay in buttermilk five or ten minutes.—E. M., Idaho.

Boil hooks and eyes in strong soda water before sewing them on garments and they will not rust.

If you have flowers planted in a dry place, try covering the soil with sawdust. It holds the moisture much longer.

When sheets are worn thin in the center, rip or cut open and sew the outer edges together.—INEZ PROVOW FITCH, Springville, Tenn.

Sprinkle a few drops of kerosene on broom a little while before sweeping and there won't be as much dust. —HAPPY-GO-LUCKY, Texas.

Put a new lamp chimney in a pan of cold water and let it come to a boil. Do not remove until water cools gradually. This toughens them.

When washing lettuce or greens of any kind, put a tablespoon of salt in the water and the dirt and grit will go to the bottom of the pan.—S. P., Luray, Va.

Try making window blinds of one and one half yards of Indian Head linen, thirty-six inches wide. Attach one end to roller and make hem in other for stick, or crochet edge for it. When the blind gets soiled it can be washed like any white cloth.—OLD SUBSCRIBER, Walton, Ky.

To remove white spots from furniture, caused by spilling of water, mix one part coal oil, and one part turpentine, using about two tablespoons of each with a cake of home-made lye soap, about one pint, and melt all together. Apply with soft cloth to white spots and it will instantly restore the color. I have tried this and find it good.—C. CLIFF.

Requests

Mrs. Horace G. Beckwith, Casper, Wyo., would like the February, 1920, issue of COMFORT.

Mrs. J. E. Haines, Burns, P. O. Box 240, Ore., would like to correspond with COMFORT folks.

Will return favor if someone will send me a December, 1919, COMFORT.—MRS. LIZZIE STAFFORD, Trezevant, R. R. 1, Tenn.

Will some kind sister please send me the January, 1918, issue of McCall's Magazine.—MRS. NORMAN E. Williams, Boyou Meto, Ark.

Will someone kindly send me The Illustrated Companion for December, 1918 and 1919.—MISS LOUISE LADD, Cerulean, Box 55, Ky.

I would like the poem beginning, "The earth has grown old with its burden of care," and "The Christmas Tree,"

"All withered and dead and cheerless
It lay in the city street;
It had had its day and glory
To be trampled 'neath the feet."

READER, COMFORT.

Home Dressmaking Hints

Forecasts for Fall Fashions

By Geneva Gladding

THE new fashions are marked by novel features in materials, combinations of fabrics, colorings and trimmings. Of course the autumn season brings a scheme somewhat subdued from the gaiety of the summer lines, but we are to have bold plaids and blocks, and splendid two-toned effects, braid and bead trimmings and plaitings galore.

Separate skirts have a strong hold on popularity and as a rule the separate blouse for wear with a suit is of a contrasting color, the color of the skirt generally appearing in the blouse in a decorative way.

Tailored suits stand out in smart simplicity. Vestees of brocaded silk and embroidered linen are a usual accessory.

Skirts are short, or rather should be of a length becoming to the wearer, and short enough for comfort and grace.

Draperies are still in vogue, as tunics, puffs, plaitings and cascades.

Chemise and coat dresses are again to the fore with new style features.

Sleeves will be worn short well into the fall season, but many smart models show long, close-fitting sleeves.

The lengthened waistline is most popular and altogether pleasing though the straight lines of the figure have not been changed.

Her Two Suitors

terest. They knew what was coming, the piece de resistance of the circus, Para in the lion's den!

A gong sounded, and instantly Para ran into the ring under the cage, a long, slender whip in his hand.

There was a roar from the entrance behind the cage, and the audience shifted uneasily, anxiously in their seats, their appetites whetted by the knowledge of danger.

A great lion, lashing his tail, rushed into the cage, a tiger followed, then another lion and a bear, then another lion, and so on until the ring was filled with animals.

The heat, or the change in Para's clothing, seemed to change the tempers of the brutes, for they were less manageable than usual, and Para was forced upon several occasions to cut one sharply with the whip. There was to follow another, though shorter act, where a female lion was made to ride upon the back of a horse.

The horse, with the single girth about his stomach, entered the ring.

Para cracked his whip gaily. He never allowed himself to become excited; but his success with the rather obstreperous animals, and the appreciation of the audience had pleased him infinitely, so in love is man with his own power. He sent the horse about the ring several times, then motioned for the entrance of the lioness.

A long, low roar, or, rather, growl, escaped her, quickly cut short by a sharp lash from Para's whip. She trotted once about the ring, turning her eyes upon him angrily; but he had seen her do that many times before, when the weather was especially warm, and paid little heed.

He seemed to have utterly forgotten the fact that he had changed his dress, and that Alice, the lioness, had not recognized it.

She obeyed him, however, when he forced her to the platform from which she was to make her spring to the horse's back.

She even obeyed when he demanded that she make the spring, and rode the horse once about the ring, leaping to the platform again as the horse passed under it, but as the horse came again, ready for her to make her second plunge upon his back, she did not respond.

Yet again he trotted around the ring, still with nothing more from her than an angry growl at Para. The third time he gave her a stinging cut from the whip, and, without further warning, she sprang, but not toward the horse, as Para had intended.

Quicker than thought, she was upon him, her long claws buried in his flesh, her glaring white teeth tearing at his neck.

Regardless of his own danger, Rudolph sprang into the cage. On the way he had seized a heavy club, and, swinging it about his head, brought it down with deadly effect upon the head of the enraged lioness.

She fell backward for a moment, glaring at him with fierce, bloodshot eyes, her mouth stained with the blood of the best friend Rudolph had ever known, and for a moment crouched to spring.

The club fell once more upon the animal's head. Another blow was not required.

She lay there, only a sharp jerking of the limbs showing that life was not quite extinct, lay helpless beside her silent victim.

Para was carried out.

"For God's sake, don't let Dorothy see him!" Rudolph whispered to some one.

But already the great, grief-stricken eyes of the girl had fallen upon the mangled remains.

She fell upon her knees beside the rude bier, and some one threw a piece of tarpaulin over the body.

The girl neither spoke nor wept. A stunned, stupid agony seemed to bewilder her.

Ten minutes before, Para as well and strong as he had ever been in his life, Para, loving and gentle and tender, had kissed her, Para in the full flush of his manhood, had been alive and well, and now—he lay there before her—how?

Some one lifted her up, but it was into Rudolph's arms that she fell, in a faint from which it seemed that they would never arouse her.

Rudolph was in his ordinary clothes when she opened her eyes to consciousness. She put up her arms and clasped them about his neck.

"What has happened to me, Rudolph?" she questioned feebly. "I feel so strangely, as if the very heart had been cut out of my body. I feel empty and utterly barren. What is it? Oh, don't answer me! I know—I know!"

They carried Para's body to the East, Rudolph and Dorothy severing their connection with the circus.

"I couldn't go on now," Rudolph told the manager. "The blow has been too crushing to permit that just at first. And then, too, I have Dorothy to think of."

"What shall you do with her?" the manager inquired.

"I don't know. I have not thought yet."

"Because you know," the man continued, "you can't go on in the old way of course, lest you would ruin the girl. She is not your sister, you know."

"What do you mean?" gasped Rudolph.

"Just what you must see when you have recovered a little more from the shock. As long as Para was alive it was all well enough, in our wild way of living, for you and Dorothy to live as you have; but now you can't go on like that. You must have some consideration for the girl. You must either leave her at home with some one, or you must marry her!"

"Marry her! Marry Dorothy!"

Oh, yes! He saw it clearly enough, now that it had been put to him. He was not Dorothy's brother. A strange tingling shot through him. He had never thought of Dorothy as anything but a sister, or an angel, until that moment.

He turned suddenly. She was just coming through a flap in the tent, white as a lily with a newly-broken stem.

For the first time in his life, he hesitated to approach her. For the first time an embarrassment seized upon him in her presence. And then the sweet, warm glow that passed through all his body told him the truth.

He loved Dorothy—not as a sister, but with the passionate ecstasy that colors all a man's after life.

CHAPTER III.

RUDOLPH'S AVOWAL.

Para was buried.

There was considerably more of an estate mentioned in his will than either Rudolph or Dorothy knew anything of.

"I don't feel as if I could ever look at tights and spangles again," Dorothy said, with a shudder. "I shall always hate the sight of a tent."

"I suppose I can do something else," he said doubtfully. "I have never tried in my life, you know; but one always finds a way if one only looks hard enough. I was born to it and brought up to it, and it seemed a natural consequence of things. Still, if you think you couldn't bear it—and it is quite natural you should, I know—why, I wouldn't distress you for all the world, Dorothy."

"But why should you?" she asked sorrowfully. "There is the money Para risked his life to earn."

"But that is yours. I wouldn't touch a cent of it for anything you could name. Suppose anything should happen to me such as happened to Para——"

"Rudolph!"

The word came so sharply, so hoarsely, that Rudolph caught her hand and pressed it tenderly.

"Forgive me!" he cried contritely. "I didn't think how it would hurt you. But I won't go back to the circus if you really wish it, dear."

"Oh, Rudolph!" she cried, clasping his hand closely and kissing it. "How good you are to me! Do you know, I have planned just the life for us! We will buy a dear little place somewhere on the river, where we shall have the country and the water, and we shall have the quaintest, prettiest little house, with ducks and geese and chickens and—and—things—horses, of course, with a boat to row on moonlit nights. Won't it be heavenly? Oh, how Para would have loved it! But—I forgot! I am always thinking of myself, and never of you, while you never think of yourself at all. You would miss the wild, roving life, the ring, and the excitement. You would have only me to look at, and you would grow horribly weary of that!"

"Indeed, I never should!" he cried eagerly. "You know better than that, Dorothy. You know that there could be no greater happiness for me than just the quiet little life you picture; but—it can't be, as—as we—are, Dorothy. You must see that, dear!"

"See what?" she ejaculated. "Why can't we be as we are?"

"Because—because, dear—you are not—not my sister—neither are you my—wife!"

"Well, of course, I'm not, and I wouldn't be for anything! Jack Haspard and his sister are always quarreling and saying nasty things to each other, and Walter Denton and his wife even fight. Don't you remember the day you knocked him down for striking her?"

"Yes, I remember, but—Walter Denton is a brute, dear. You don't think I could ever be like him, do you?"

"No, I don't think you could ever be like him. But what did you mean? If you wouldn't grow tired of me, why shouldn't we have our little house in the country?"

"I——I, oh, Dorothy, we lost more than either of us thought when dear old Para died. His presence made everything right. He was our father; but, dear—I am a young man, as far as years go, though I seem old enough to be your father. The world does not allow an unprotected girl like you and a young man like me, who are neither brother and sister, nor yet man and wife, to live beneath the same roof. It breaks my heart to tell you this, dear, and yet I should be doing less than my duty to you if I did not do it, Dorothy."

"What has the world to do with you and me?" she demanded hotly.

"Nothing now, perhaps, but some day you might curse me for not better protecting your innocence. You remember how you came to us, Para and me, Dorothy? Well, some day you may find your family, and when you do, dear, they will be wealthy and powerful. I am sure of that, from the quality of the little clothes we have so carefully preserved. When that day comes, there must be no stain, even placed there by innocence, upon your snow-white reputation. Dearly as I love you, deeply as it will grieve me, I must leave you, Dorothy, unless—unless——"

"Unless what?"

"Unless you should become—my wife!"

The words were whispered. He couldn't voice them, try as he would. His emotion seemed choking him, and yet he would not have influenced her by an exhibition of it for all the world.

"Oh, no, Rudolph!" she cried out hastily, flinging out her hands deprecatingly. "I couldn't! It would be like marrying my own brother! I couldn't do that! And you couldn't! Why, we should hate each other in a month! And I couldn't bear that, dear! I want to love you always, always! You and Nemo are all I have now!"

The last sentence, so plaintive that it ended in a little wail, seemed to pierce him like a hot iron. It told him so clearly, so concisely, so—hopelessly the truth. She clung to him because he and the wolf were all that was left her! She loved him, because she had nothing else under heaven that was human to love. She would have been as utterly alone, but for him, as if the earth contained no other presence than her own.

That was why she loved him, and only that!

He forced a smile to his lips, and leaned forward where she could not see his haggard face at all.

"And as long as Nemo and I live you shall have us," he answered softly.

"Then we may have the house in the country, Rudolph?"

"Yes, but not with me, dear. I shall come to see you sometimes; but, much as it will hurt me, much as I know you will miss me, I must consider your reputation first. Please don't ask me any questions tonight, Dorothy. I am very tired, and my—head aches so!"

"Good night, Rudolph. You are not annoyed at anything that I have said, are you?" wistfully.

"No; I could never be annoyed with you."

But as the door closed, shutting him out of her presence, the words Para had spoken on the afternoon that she came to him—spoken with death and destruction all about him—recurred to Rudolph:

"Pray God I am not hanging a millstone around your neck that will drag you to destruction some day!"

TO BE CONTINUED.

Subscribers are invited to write to this department asking for any information desired relative to the treatment of animal troubles. Questions will be answered in these columns free by an eminent veterinarian. Describe the trouble fully, sign full name and give your address; direct all correspondence to the Veterinary Department, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

Red Water

HEMOGLOBINURIA, commonly called "red water," is a comparatively common and serious ailment of cattle on some Pacifice Coast farms. We have received a great many inquiries regarding it from readers in Oregon and Washington and have had to tell them that no specific remedy has been found for the disease which has by some been attributed to acrid matters in the wild pastures and by more scientific investigators to micro-organisms known as protozoa. Affected cattle pass red-colored urine and gradually waste away and finally succumb, although they may manage to survive for a long time. In some cases the disease is acute; in others it tends to assume a chronic form. Popular remedies have been alum, powdered copperas (sulphate of iron), iodin and iodide of potash. They have been fairly effective in some cases.

Now come veterinarians of Holland and Denmark who have had experience with the disease and assert that they have found a better medicine combination than those we have mentioned. It would appear to be somewhat strong and dangerous, but they say it is safe; so our readers in the districts where the disease is experienced may care to give it a trial. The formula is as follows: Sugar of lead and camphor, of each three grams (a gram is 15 grains, or one-fourth dram powdered tormentilla and powdered alum, of each 15 grams. Mix and divide into six powders and give one night and morning, in water or feed. Affected cattle should, of course, be kept off pastures where the disease has occurred and it also would be well to pasture other cattle elsewhere while the disease is prevalent.

DEATH OF HORSE.—I had a very fine horse, six years old. I found him at three o'clock in the afternoon with white foam running from his nose and mouth. He wouldn't eat but wanted water, and staggered. He grew worse, dying at ten that night. It was the opinion of some that he was poisoned. J. M. F.

A.—One at a distance cannot make a confident diagnosis in such a case, but poisoning would be a possible cause of death. The horse may have got at lead or arsenic. Malicious poisoning is very rare in our experience, although commonly suspected.

ITCHING SKIN.—I have a mare that hasn't much mane; the longest is not over six inches and, under the mane it seems to be in a scaly condition and no hair growing there. Can you tell me what to do? (2) I have a mule, which in summer time has trouble with her eyes. They seem to be inflamed and run water and pus. Would flies cause this? Please give me a remedy. C. G. E.

A.—Perfectly cleanse the skin by scrubbing with soap and hot water, then rub in, every three days, a mixture of two ounces of flowers of sulphur, half an ounce of coal tar dip or disinfectant and one pint of cottonseed oil. (2) In such cases we usually find that the tear ducts are blocked, or partially so, and flies aggravate the irritation. A veterinarian could clear the ducts. Meanwhile, bathe the eyes three times daily with a saturated solution of boric acid, applied by means of clean absorbent cotton swabs, and once or twice daily apply iodoform salve to the skin under the eyes to keep the flies away.

BLACK TONGUE.—Will you tell me if my dog was poisoned or had some disease. He refused to eat or drink. In trying to drink, his tongue was affected in such a way that he couldn't lap the water. Soon after, he began slobbering, and on examination I found that his mouth was black but not his tongue. A bloody substance was emitted from the alimentary canal. When I poured water in his mouth it seemed difficult for him to swallow it, and he coughed after it. The slobbers became thick and yellowish and had a red tinge. He lived eight days. G. C.

A.—The dog, in all probability, died of black tongue which is common and malignant in the Southern states, but in all such cases it is highly important to have a veterinarian examine the affected dog as rabies (hydrophobia) may be mistaken for the other disease. There is no specific remedy for black tongue but good results have been reported from swabbing or spraying the mouth with water, tinged light blue with sulphate of copper, or pink with permanganate of potash. Borax, also, should be given in water to cut the phlegm in the throat.

AILING COW.—My Jersey cow, three years old, has her second calf. At times she is hearty and seems well, but every few weeks she loses her appetite and won't eat or drink and stands and grits her teeth. She eats green grass better than anything. MRS. L. C. D.

A.—Indigestion is a common cause of such symptoms but as tuberculosis is a probable cause it always is well to have the tubercular test applied by a veterinarian. Meanwhile, give her one half an ounce of aromatic spirits of ammonia, two drams of fluid extract of gentian root and three drops of fluid extract of nux vomica twice daily in a pint of thin gruel or flaxseed tea. Gradually increase the dose of nux but go back to the first dose if any alarming symptoms appear. Try feeding whole oats, wheat, bran and corn.

SNUFFLES.—When my rabbits are from two to four months old they take sick, hold their heads up high, fall over and die. Their bowels are loose and a jelly-like substance passes from the stomach and large bowel. I am careful about feeding them green stuff. Can you tell me what to do for snuffles? M. E.

A.—It is usual to destroy rabbits affected with snuffles and then start afresh with sound stock in new quarters. There is no medicinal remedy, but if you can employ a qualified veterinarian he may be able to do some good by use of a bacterin against the disease. The supposed indigestion probably is merely a complication or symptom of snuffles. We should advise you to move unaffected rabbits into new quarters with large runs or good grass pasture and then feed carefully.

LEAKING TEATS.—I have a cow seven years old that loses her milk. Is there a remedy for it and if so what is it? MRS. J. F. A.

A.—Milk three times daily; if this doesn't mend matter, apply melted wax or paraffin to the tips of the teat after each milking. As a last resort, apply flexible collodion in the same way until the skin becomes irritated when treatment should be discontinued for some time.

She was up and dressed early the next morning but a blend of pride and anger kept her above-stairs till her husband had left. Then, as on the previous morning, she went directly to the kitchen.

"Good morning, Delia," she began. "Did you give Mr. Manning eggs this morning?"

"I did that. Him and Master Peter, too. I fried——"

"Delia! You know that I don't approve of fried things for Peter."

Delia began her familiar prologue: "If you ain't satisfied——"

"I am not," Sylvia cut in sharply. "Hereafter you will obey orders, Delia."

"I'll leave if——"

"Come to think of it, you will leave any way. You are discharged, Delia."

With Delia gone, Sylvia flew about the house with unwonted energy. "We'll see," she paused frequently to say, "whether Betty Farriday or any other female efficiency expert sets her foot in my house in the role of teacher. I'd like to catch one of them at it!"

She set the house to rights and marketed by telephone before retrieving Peter from the yard to superintend a bath.

Delighted with the attention, Peter was unusually responsive and Sylvia, yearning for any sign of attention to salve her bruised spirit, chattered with him gaily.

They ate a cheerful luncheon of bread and milk and, with the vegetables and a roast in the long disused fireless cooker, Sylvia raced for the train to town.

She was about to do something very distasteful. She had made an appointment with Roger's sister and was on her way to keep it. She knew intuitively that Jean had never approved of her, yet it was to her that she turned in her necessity.

She entered Jean's artistic bachelor apartment and stated her errand briefly. "And I don't want you to take the trouble to be kind," she finished.

"I have made a lovely mess of things and you know it. Roger has forged miles ahead of me. My task is to catch up and keep abreast of him. I shall lose my spiritual breath many times, of course. Honestly, Jean, what do you think of my chances?"

Jean looked at her, a new look of respect in her eyes. "Do you know what we called you in college?" she asked.

Sylvia shook a dispirited head.

"Slothful Sylvia! And Betty used to say that you were built without a self-starter."

"Betty!"

"You placed a whole hymn of hate in that one word, Sylvia. Just why?"

"I am afraid of her, Jean. Roger always liked her. As a young widow in business, she is adorable. She has come to Brookhurst to live and they are thrown together a lot."

Jean opened her lips to speak, thought better of it, and relapsed into silence.

"You know, Sylvia," she began after a moment, "if you accomplish anything, you'll have to fight like the devil."

"That doesn't frighten me, Jean."

"It may before you're done. You know you are rather a fright. Your clothes are all wrong and you are far too—ample."

"Thank you for not calling me fat," Sylvia smiled wanly.

Sylvia reached home first that afternoon and made painstaking preparations for dinner. When Roger came, he entered the dining-room frolicking with Peter to hide the fact that he was ill at ease. All day he had been calling himself a brute. If Sylvia had been in a melting mood he would have undone all that he had accomplished.

But Sylvia was unapproachable. She held up a cheek for his kiss and immediately placed herself out of his range.

"Our handmaiden decamped?" he inquired as she began to serve the dinner.

She nodded. "I am going to try getting along alone for a month," she returned.

The next morning Sylvia was up at daybreak. With teeth clenched, she went under the cold shower. After dressing carefully, she went below and opened the house. Spring, elusive for so long, was upon them. She stood for a moment at an open door, wondering what the budding season would bring to her.

That morning Roger mused uneasily on his way to town. "I seem to have started something," he thought ruefully. "But, anyway," he added, brightening, "that was a darned good breakfast."

That day Sylvia met Jean in town and together they went to a dressmaker. "It is obviously going to be expensive," the former said on coming out several hours later, "but if it does the business, it will be a bargain."

Jean bundled her into a taxicab and gave the driver the address of a famous physical director. "Just to get you started, you know," she explained. "I take it that you want speedy results."

The next few months were busy ones for Sylvia. She managed the house so that the most discriminating could find no flaw. She placed herself under Doctor Mason's direction in the care of Peter.

She golfed and cold-showered, and her flabby flesh grew firm as her body became slender. Her blue eyes took on the brilliance of sapphires and the golden lights were tempted to come out in her carefully-tended hair.

Nor was her gain all physical. She found what the club would study the next winter and did some advance reading on the subjects.

And she grew steadily in popularity. Roger was now identified with the Brewster forces and Mrs. Brewster had elected to be very gracious to her.

It was not a miracle that Sylvia had performed—it was what any woman could do by setting her sluggish mind and body at work.

But she was not happy. Her husband, she was convinced, had been unnecessarily cruel and she shut him away from her by an impalpable barrier. She repulsed his advances till hurt pride caused him to cease to make them.

She knew that he was seeing a great deal of Betty Farriday. Frequently Peter, going to meet him, would return with the news that "fardie was walking with the pritty lady." Often, between the two, she intercepted intimate smiles, came upon them in earnest conversation.

With all her woman's weapons, Sylvia fought stubbornly on. She would make herself as desirable as she could, but she would permit no upsurge of emotion on either side to bring him to her feet.

One night in late summer, Sylvia entertained. Betty, never more radiant, was among the guests. After dinner, Roger drew her into the dim library where Sylvia, a few moments later, came upon them.

Betty's hands were in his and her ardent face was upturned to meet his eyes. Silently Sylvia went back to her guests. The remainder of the evening was torment, but she took it with her chin up.

Her guests gone, she went wearily up to her room. She had fought the good fight. At what spiritual and physical expense no one guessed, she had overcome inertia. And to what purpose? What did it matter that the fog-blue frock that she wore became her so well? What did anything matter?

She wheeled and faced her husband.

"I don't know that you will be interested," he said from the threshold, "but Betty wants me to tell you."

"Indeed!" Her voice was cool and steady but there was a hideous stricture at her throat.

"She is going to be married next week to a man just home from reconstruction work in France."

Sylvia fell back a step, catching at a chair to steady her weak knees.

"You were splendid tonight, Sylvia; I was very proof that they had reached the parting of their ways?

She lifted herself on an elbow and strained toward a mirror. Her plump cheeks, massaged by an inexpert hand, were red and tear-stained; her over-curled hair was grotesque. She settled back on the bed, whimpering.

After a little she went for comfort to the nursery. Peter looked warm and uncomfortable; heat and a too-indulgent attitude toward dirt had started a rash on his sensitive skin. With an upsurge of tenderness, Sylvia bent over and kissed him.

"You are all that mother has left," she whispered.

Finally she went to bed, but not to sleep. When she heard Roger's latch-key and his approaching footsteps, she lay breathless, listening. He paused for an instant before her door before going on to his room. Sylvia sobbed again, this time very gently.

Cross directions for a baby's hood was to cast on about forty stitches, using No. 5 needles. Knit a strip about fourteen inches long, or so that when laid over the child's head it will meet under the chin to within three inches, and bind off. Take up the stitches along one side, knit on about seven ribs, bind off and then turn back for front edge of hood. Sew together the other edge and the hood is shaped. Around the neck edge crochet a run for the ribbon and edge with scallops. With this idea in mind, the size can readily be changed.

One who knits socks will have no trouble in cutting out worn heels and knitting in new, and when once accomplished it is less work and far more satisfactory than filling in large holes with a darning stitch. In cutting out the worn part, cut only within half-an-inch of where the stitches are to be taken up, as this gives a chance to ravel back from the line of cutting. New toes may also be knitted on, making practically a new pair of socks.

After raveling wool, it is made into skeins, worked up and down in a lukewarm suds, rinsed in two waters of same temperature and hung to dry without wringing. This removes all the "kinks."

Millinery at Home

The milliners will tell you that home hat making has greatly cut into their business. Years back, this state of affairs would have been quite impossible, for hat making was hopelessly complicated, and it required a professional "maker" and trimmer to do the trick. Nowadays, it is quite another thing, for shapes that are designed for little trimming, frames to be covered that cost about thirty-five cents, or a band of buckram and some silk, makes up the majority of materials from which hats are made. Such hats are easily copied, and the home-made hat has come to stay for a time at least.

Some of the very prettiest hats are made by taking an old straw hat, cutting away the brim to within one inch of the crown and gathering onto either side of the inch of remaining brim, close to the crown, a frill of ribbon. It should be just wide enough to give the desired size of hat at the outer edge. Between the two thicknesses of ribbon, lightly tack here and there a piece of hat wire three-quarters as long as the ribbon is wide. This will hold the ribbon brim as the wearer may choose to shape it. Bring the selvage edges of the two ribbons together and lightly tack at intervals. If the crown requires freshening, brush, and color to match ribbon. Dyes that color straw can usually be bought at drug stores. The process is very simple.

For a becoming fall hat (see Page 17), make a band of buckram to fit the head. It should be cut slightly circular, so that when sewed together the top will be a little smaller round. It should not fit closely as the velvet will take up the head size. Bind both edges with a bias piece of muslin. Cover the top with velvet, letting it lap well onto the band. Fold a strip of bias velvet, and cut it about one and a half times as wide as the band is high. Seam together, turn, baste the two bias edges together and run in two strong draw threads. It will put on easier if separate draw strings are in each half. Sew the shirred edge to the inside of the band, letting the velvet lap well. Arrange gathers evenly. Cut a bias band of velvet to cover the buckram, wide enough to turn in on each side, and long enough to fit fairly smooth at the lower edge. Seam together. Run in two draw strings at the top edge with a fine stitch, and sew this edge to velvet top at edge of crown. It is best to baste the shirred edge flat on the wrong side and make a smooth seam through the first shirring. Turn down, put a long basting way around, turn under the lower edge and tack to place. This soft brim can be turned back, at the most becoming angle. Line with silk or cotton muslin, cutting an oval top and sewing on a bias strip much as the outside is made.

Brother's old felt hat was the foundation used in making the pretty style shown in the first illustration. Put the felt hat on the head after the sweat-band has been removed. If small, it can be considerably stretched, but if not large enough, cut off the brim and then cut four straight slits from outer edge of hat to about half way up the crown; one each side of front and back. Fit a loose, narrow band of buckram to the head and over it draw the hat, letting the slit places spread to fit, then pinning and later sewing them firmly. Use the cut-off brim from which to shape the one shown in picture. The back and sides are short, while the front is deeper. It will probably be necessary to slit and lap the brim at intervals to get the straight front. If the head size has been made larger, set pieces into the back part of brim where it is short. Cover the brim smoothly from bias strips. Cover the crown with a circular piece gathered at the edge. It should fit a little loosely onto the felt crown. Lap the crown onto the brim and sew together. Trim with ribbon band and finish with graceful bow.

On plain shapes, crocheted bands and flowers from worsteds are very popular.

When hat frames are to be covered smoothly, hold the covering in place with a large rubber band and arrange the folds under it. This holds them in place until sewed.

Hanging a Skirt

See Illustration

Unless a skirt hangs perfectly, it is without style. It must be about one quarter of an inch shorter in the back than in front. When skirts are made of checks or plaids, and the wearer takes them up evenly front and back, the skirt may be "lifted" a little higher into the belt at the back and thereby shorten the quarter inch. Or, the wearer may "take up" a skirt a quarter inch, and if so, by making it even length the same result is obtained. But for women who are large and cannot so easily hang a skirt, the home dressmaker must have assistance, and here it is.

Pull apart the dining-room table just enough to admit and hold a sharply-pointed piece of chalk. If this type of table is not available, lay the chalk flat on the table and hold it steadily with a flatiron. Have the skirt in the belt and finished. Put it on and stand against the chalk so that the mark will come well below the hips. If the table is too high, stand on a box or something steady that will bring the elevation right. Slowly turn until you have a connecting white line. Remove the skirt and lay it flat on the table. Measure the front to see what portion of the skirt length has been taken between the belt and chalk line, and deduct that number of inches from the entire skirt length to edge of hem. Whatever number of inches remain, take them as your guide and mark your skirt all the way around and turn hem on chalk mark. The skirt cannot help being even, as the skirt always "takes up" between the belt and below hips.

The Family Doctor

The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases hould be taken to your local doctor.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

MISS M. S., Rhine, Ga.—Warts can be removed from the hand in several ways. The best way to remove them is by using the actual cautery—electric or thermic—of course this must be done by some one accustomed to the use of both methods. Chemical cauteries are more or less dangerous and to be avoided. Deafness, if catarrhal in origin, is probably hopeless. The best that can be done is only palliative.

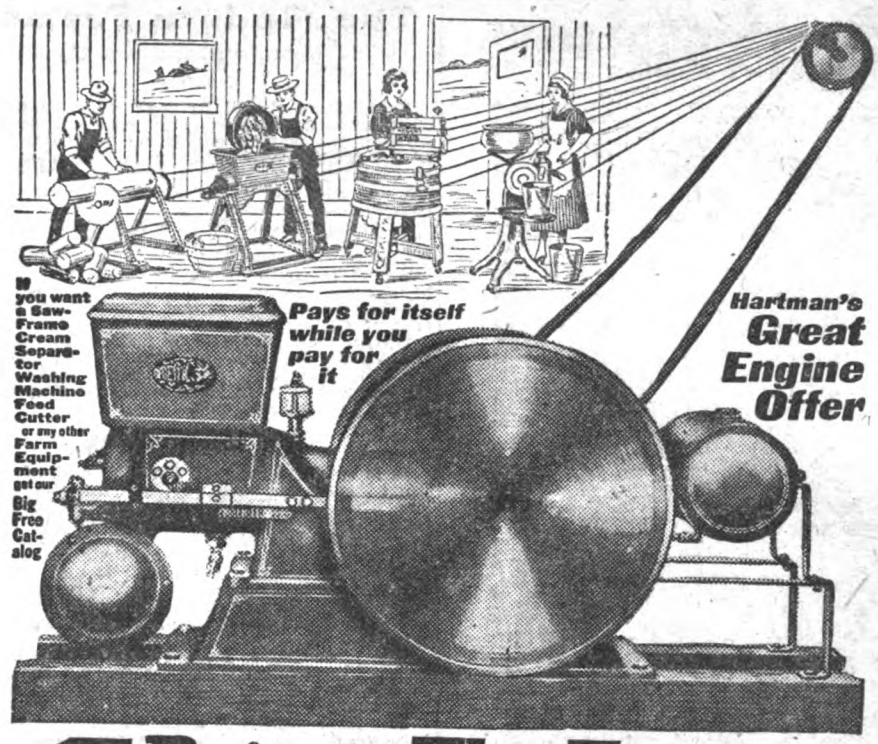
MR. E. G. J., Jones, Ga.—Probably your universal pains are malarial. Try fluid extract of eupatorium, in teaspoonful doses, after meals.

MRS. U. M., Tate, Texas.—The solution of resorcin is not a hair dye in any sense. It is a hair tonic. Ten grains of the resorcin to the ounce of equal parts of rose water and grain alcohol is the proper proportion.

MRS. W. C. S., Moorhead, Miss.—You are rheumatic. Take five-grain doses of salicylate of soda three times a day after meals. Also drink two quarts of water daily. Avoid sweets of all kinds, including pastry. Live on green vegetables and skimmed, or buttermilk, for a while. For the pain in the back, apply a mustard plaster to the parts once a day.

MRS. J. S., Reeds Mills, Ohio.—The blue spots on face and body are due to thin blood. Try Basham's mixture, in tablespoonful doses, three times a day after meals.

MRS. B. K., Providence, Ky.—Eat good wholesome food and take Basham's mixture in tablespoonful doses after meals, well diluted. This should build you up.



MRS. E. B., Casey, Ill.—You better have your blood examined for some blood trouble. In the meantime you can take five-grain doses of the iodide of potassium, in water, after meals. Apply to the scalp a two per cent solution of resorcin dissolved in equal parts of grain alcohol and rose water. Apply this lotion two or three times a day, for a few days, and then only once a day.

MRS. W. E. D., Richardsons [illegible].—You have an inflammation of the bladder and must have the bladder washed out, several times, by your local doctor. You may also take five-grain [illegible] of urotropin, three times a day after meals. The yellow spots are due to an autointoxication. The remedy above mentioned, including the bladder irrigation, and not the result in general.

MRS. C. E. W., Pahokee, Fla.—For the numbness of hand and forearm, nothing is better than massage, electricity, and 1-60 gr. tablet, three times a day, of strichnia sulph. after meals, to be taken only on your doctor's prescription.

MRS. W. B., Sharon, Pa.—For the bladder trouble, take five-grain tablets of urotropin after meals, three times a day, and drink plenty of good spring water, as well. A good tonic for your husband would be Basham's mixture, taken in tablespoonful doses after meals well diluted.

MRS. E. S., Okeechobee, Fla.—Try five-grain pills of assafœtida after meals for the nervous dyspepsia you complain of. Of course, avoid any food that is likely to cause distress in the stomach, such as sweets, pastry and the like.

No corns exist
with nurses—for they know

Nurses don't have corns. Nor do doctors or their wives.

They know Blue-jay and employ it. So do millions of others now.

It is time that everybody knew this simple, scientific way to end a corn.

Do this tonight

Apply liquid Blue-jay or a Blue-jay plaster. Either requires but a jiffy.

The pain will stop. Soon the entire corn will loosen and come out.

What that corn does, every corn will do. So this way means a life-long respite from the aches of corns.

Corns merely pared or padded rarely disappear. Harsh treatments often cause a soreness.

Blue-jay is gentle, scientific, sure. It is a creation of this world-famed laboratory.

It is the right way. It will be the universal way when all folks know it.

Buy Blue-jay from your druggist. Watch it on one corn.

proud of you. Don't you think I have been punished enough?"

"Was Betty telling you—that—when you were holding hands?" she asked weakly.

"Bless you, no! Jean and I have known it for months. Did you catch us holding hands, Sylvia?" he asked, smiling.

She nodded. "I nearly d-died," she confessed shyly.

"She was only thanking me for some business I have closed up for her. Betty is the kind of girl who can't thank you without holding hands."

"I nearly died," Sylvia repeated dazedly.

He reached her side at a bound. "Does that mean that you love me—that I am forgiven?" he asked eagerly.

"You must be very stupid if you have to ask," she faltered.

She found herself against his breast and felt his lips pressed to her shining hair.

Study this chart carefully—it means money to you

Every Day Spent in School Pays the Child Nine Dollars
Here is the Proof

Uneducated laborers earn on the average $500 per year for forty years, a total of.....$20,000
HIGH SCHOOL GRADUATES earn on the average $1,000 per year for forty years, a total of.....$40,000
This education required 12 years of school of 180 days each, total of 2160 days in school.
If 2160 days at school add $20,000 to the income for life, then each day at school adds $9.02.
The child that stays out of school to earn less than $9.00 a day is losing money—not making money

NOTE—This chart was compiled in 1917, prior to the present high salaries. Today instead of $9.02 it would be between $15.00 and $20.00 a day.

If you have not completed your high school training then do so without delay. Already you have completed a large part of the 12 year work specified by the Government, realize on the work you have done. You can get a thorough, complete high school training in two years time—in your own home—during your spare time. Two hours a day is all you need.

Are you or your children making this extra $9.00 a day or losing it? Why waste money when it's yours for the asking? Write for details today.

STANDARD FOOD & FUR ASS'N
405 A. Broadway New York

The Modern Farmer

Poultry

Every farm should be equipped with a well-built henhouse, brooder pens and every necessity to keep the poultry supply up to the demands of the family needs. The farm wife should not be expected to care for a flock of poultry with old dry goods boxes or any old shelter she is able to nail up herself.

After all, with a big variety of vegetables, an abundance of milk, cream and butter, store shelves loaded with sauces and jellies, the curing room hung with ham and bacon and a big flock of poultry for fries, bakes and stews, is it any wonder that the farmer cannot literally live off the "fat of the land"?

He can and should if he makes the vegetable garden, the orchard, the fruit garden, the raising and curing of meat, the proper care of poultry as much a main issue of his farming as the raising of corn and oats.

Pin Money Crops

It is in these days of the high cost of everything the farmer must buy, and the comparative low price of what he has to sell that the farmer's wife likes to have an income, no matter how small, that she can really call her own, with which she can buy the little extras that may not be actual necessities. It may be some convenience or labor-saving device in the home, or some little luxury that she may think she cannot have if the money is to be taken out of the farm income.

The farm that is located near a town or city or on a good automobile road has an advantage in disposing of any surplus crop that the wife may have to sell.

The farm garden is a good source of income. In a good farm garden there are always times when there are more vegetables than the family can use,—particularly radishes, lettuce and the kind which do not admit of canning or storage. These the wife and children can prepare in an attractive manner and sell them either to the grocery in the city or by advertising the fact with a bulletin board in front of the house. The farmer's wife who lives near a large town can prepare hampers of vegetables for a few customers she may have. Town people are glad to pay extra for strictly fresh vegetables. If the farm wife lives on a farm that has a good fruit garden and orchard, extra apples or berries will prove a splendid pin money crop.

Save the Windfalls

So many farmers let the windfalls rot on the ground or turn their hogs in to eat them when with a little care they can be harvested to good advantage. Close watch should be made of the apple orchard and the windfalls picked up at once and sorted. Ready sale is realized if they are taken to a town market or sold to the grocer or to special customers. Many people in town are glad to get such fruit as it is usually sold below the price that is demanded for the later and more perfect apples.

If the farm is not located near enough to deliver the fruit often it can be canned and sold as "home canned fruit" at an exchange or grocery. In these days of the high cost of sugar, fruit can be canned for pies, unsweetened, and hotels, restaurants or boarding-houses are very glad to get it.

Sell Flowers

Flowers also can be made a source of income. In some groceries, flowers are sold as a side-line, and come from farms near the city. One can buy sweet peas, pansies, daisies, asters and such old-fashioned flowers for about half that is paid at the greenhouse. Also boxes of flowering plants are for sale in the spring, ready to set out without bothering with planting the seeds.

Market Herbs

An herb garden is also quite an addition to the "pin money" crops. Many varieties such as balm, fennel, horehound, lavender, pennyroyal, peppermint, sage, are perennial and require only the picking and care in drying.

We all know how hard it is to get good sage for meat dressings, or dill for pickles, or lavender for perfuming linen.

Some farms have a bulletin board in front of the house and advertise what is for sale.

Dispose of Vegetables

In planning for "pin money" crops, it is well to raise some vegetable or fruit or herb that there is generally a scarcity of. There is always a ready sale for slicing cucumbers, small beets, celery, head lettuce, muskmelons, sweet peppers, asparagus, egg plant or kohlrabi, almost all herbs, aromatic, savory or medicinal, are hard to get, and with any market at all, all kinds of extra fruit can be turned into a "pin money" crop.

Sell the Extra Berries

Blackberries are easy to grow and in many localities demand a good price. It's surprising how many blackberries can be raised from a small patch. A good big patch of hardy blackberries will mean a substantial addition to the "pin money" crop. They pack down very little after being picked and the boxes can be filled rapidly.

If the children are paid for picking them they will be eager for a big blackberry patch to add to the "pin money."

The thrifty housewife who lives near a town or city or on a good automobile road need not let any surplus fruit or vegetables go to waste. With the help of her boys and girls she may be able to realize quite a tidy sum at the end of the vegetable or fruit season.

Questions and Answers

KILLING CANADA THISTLES.—We have a lot of Canada thistles on our farm. Can you tell us how to destroy them?
W. P. S., Plymouth, Ind.

A.—When Canada thistles abound, the best plan is to plow very deep in autumn and then seed to rye or winter wheat that may be harvested early. After removing the fall-seeded crop, plow shallow, disk well and seed to corn or late potatoes that have to be cultivated or hoed. So far as possible, no thistle should be allowed to show above ground. So treated, they die out, but they will live indefinitely if some of them are allowed to bloom. Small patches should be plowed under and the land then kept so constantly disked and harrowed that not a thistle shows up for one or two years. We have smothered little patches by covering with tar paper and weighting the paper down with stones. Heavy mulching with sorghum straw also works pretty well. Saturating two or three times with a strong solution of sulphate of iron also may be tried.

AILING DEWBERRIES.—Our dewberries have very long stalks and the berries on the ends of them dried up before they were ripe. I would like to know whether the ends should have been cut off, and, if so, when is the proper time to prune them.
R. A., Escondido, Calif.

A.—The bushes should be well pruned by an expert in fall, or very early spring, and the land should be deeply cultivated, well manured and then heavily mulched around the bushes to conserve moisture. If the mulching cannot well be done, seed to a cover crop of buckwheat, clover or any crop that succeeds well in your district. We suspect that drying out of the root growths has caused withering of ends of stems. It would be well, however, to take the advice of experienced fruit growers in your district, as some local cause may be present and understood by such growers, or some plant disease be the cause and require special treatment. Meanwhile, apply to the state agricultural experiment station for a bulletin on cultivation of the dewberry.

causes a man who gets twelve dollars a day to do only two dollars' worth of work, and if you can discover what we are going to do for paint for houses if the ladies are going to insist on putting it all on their faces, you will have Sherlock Holmes backed off the boards and win the gratitude of a suffering nation. If, too, you can discover who it is that prevents the profiteers from getting shot, and why the gentlemen who want to free Ireland don't go home and do it and give the rest of a weary world a little peace, you will become the queen of the detective business. I tell you, there is a lot of money in this detective business, or there would be, but, alas, the tin Lizzie fans and flivver enthusiasts have run down about everything there is in this world that could be run down. However, Lottie, I think I have made some suggestions that will be helpful and given you some clues that even a flivver can't annihilate. A clue is something the detective finds when he can't find the criminal. We want people who can hunt down criminals, but that's dangerous and useful work. Like most young ladies, male and female, you only want a soft job. The risking of life, the carrying out of duty to the bitter end, calls for courage and sacrifice, and these are qualities that are rapidly becoming extinct. When it is a matter of facing a gun, it's a case of "Let George do it!" Poor George, he must be awfully tired.

How Women Are Often Cheated Out Of Their Best Years

Physician Explains How Many Women Undermine Their Health and Wreck Their Happiness by Letting the Iron in Their Blood Run Low

Tells How Organic Iron, Like Nuxated Iron, Helps Strengthen The Nerves, Puts Roses In the Cheeks and New Vigor and Health In the Veins Of Pale, Careworn Women.

"Where Are My Best Years Going?" asks many a woman who sits indoors, too tired to play, too listless to enjoy the good things of life. Dr. Sullivan in the accompanying article explains how women may quickly regain their health and happiness by the use of organic iron—like Nuxated Iron.

Lack of iron robs the blood of its power to make firm and healthy tissue, brain, and muscle out of the food we eat and the oxygen we breath, and turns a woman with rosy cheeks, sparkling health and boundless energy into one who is pale, run-down, tired and hopeless. Her thin, watery blood, lacking strength-giving iron, undernourishes her body and brain and robs her of her natural energy and cheerfulness. She loses interest in life and cannot enter into the normal healthy pleasures of those about her. She is literally cheating herself out of the best years of her life, when she might, in most cases, quickly regain her strength and vitality by feeding her blood with organic iron—Nuxated Iron.

The alarming deficiency of iron in the blood of so many women of today has been explained by a number of doctors as being due to the abnormal hurry and strain of modern life, as well as worry and over-work, and our refined, unnatural diet. These all tend to drain the natural iron from the blood faster than the body can replace it without assistance. Under these conditions we should feed the blood with organic iron, and Dr. James Francis Sullivan, formerly of Bellevue Hospital (Outdoor Dept.), New York, and Westchester County Hospital, explains below why organic iron, like Nuxated Iron, is administered to nervous and run-down women to make them stronger, healthier, and happier.

"Every woman has the right to years of vigor and health. But many a woman cheats herself of her best years by allowing lack of iron in her blood to undermine her health.

"To me the saddest feature of modern life is the number of unhappy, careworn women who might so easily regain happiness and health. Doctors' offices are filled with women who are constantly tired, pale, sickly, uninterested in life. I am convinced that many such women, by simply putting iron in their blood, might readily build up rich red blood, increase physical energy, and get themselves into a condition to ward off the millions of disease germs that are almost continually around us. To put the necessary iron in the blood, I have prescribed Nuxated Iron many, many times, and I have seen frequent instances where it gave renewed strength and energy, increased power of endurance, steady nerves, and the rosy bloom of health in about ten days or two weeks' time. I consider Nuxated Iron one of the foremost blood and body builders—the best to which I have ever had recourse."

MANUFACTURERS' NOTE.—Nuxated Iron, which is recommended above, is not a secret remedy but one which is well known to druggists everywhere. Unlike the older inorganic iron products it is easily assimilated and does not injure the teeth, make them black, nor upset the stomach. Each tablet of genuine Nuxated Iron is stamped as follows: N and the words Nuxated Iron are stamped into each bottle, so that the public may not be led into accepting inferior substitutes. The manufacturers guarantee successful and entirely satisfactory results to every purchaser or they will refund your money. It is dispensed by all good druggists.

NUXATED IRON

For Anaemic, Nervous, Run Down People

The Modern Wash Day

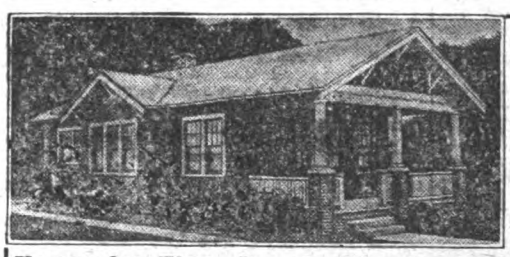
class of things which require care a little out of the ordinary, and the right treatment prolongs their usefulness. Many things are made to look like new when ironed or smoothed by being drawn back and forth across an inverted iron. A small home-made rack through which the handle of the iron slips will hold it securely.

Hair ribbons washed in a strong suds made from fine soap, and rinsed in two or more waters containing a very little soap, made partly dry by folding in a towel and finished by drawing across a moderately hot inverted iron, will look surprisingly well. Never rub ribbon, but cleanse by working it up and down in water. A strip of muslin held under the ribbon as it is smoothed over the iron gives even a better finish.

Often velvet looks worn when it is only defaced by dust and the nap being crushed. It can be restored by first thoroughly brushing with a soft brush, then laying a wet cloth over the back of the velvet, and lifting the two together and passing them slowly over a hot inverted iron, the wet cloth next to the iron. If any hard creases do not yield at once, do a little brushing as the velvet steams. Many materials are freshened by steaming over an inverted iron.

Laces and loose-stitch embroideries that the iron is liable to catch in should be done over an inverted iron.



Washing Sweaters

So many sweaters are never wearable again after washing because it was not properly done. At least, they look so badly from stretching and twisting that they are not presentable for good wear. All this is unnecessary, for a sweater is very easily washed. First, taking white, gray, brown or dark blue, there is little danger of color changing. For such, make a strong, lukewarm suds and soak the sweater twenty minutes. Wash by squeezing with the hands or using a hand washer. Do not work up and down as the weight of water may stretch the wool. Make a second and third suds and put the sweater through without soaking. Put through tepid rinse waters until clear. When changing from one water to another, never wring the sweater. It may be squeezed a very little. There is really only one way to dry a sweater properly. It should be laid out flat on thin muslin or cheese-cloth stretched tight from four corners, hammock-fashion. The accompanying illustration shows such an arrangement. In this way the water drains out evenly and it quickly dries. Select a bright, windy day.

Where the color of a sweater seems doubtful, first soak in half-a-pailful of lukewarm water to which four tablespoons of turpentine and one cup of salt have been added. Wash as above described. It is well to sew up all buttonholes before washing sweaters.

Soap Bark Washing

A solution of soap bark is excellent for woolen dress materials, colored corduroy, woolen middy blouses, men's trousers, etc. It can be purchased cheaply at drug stores or general merchandise stores. Make a solution by boiling one cup of soap bark and one quart of water five minutes. Strain and mix with wash water. Rinse through several waters and hang to dry dripping wet.

5-Piece Manicure Set

In A Roll-Up Leather Case

Given For A Club Of Four

A PRACTICAL and beautiful set, containing everything necessary for the proper care of the nails. It consists of a 4-inch flexible polished steel nail file, a pair of 3½-inch polished steel curved nail scissors, a 4¾-inch cuticle knife with Ivory white handle, a 4-inch Ivory white nail stick, and a 3¾-inch nail polisher or buffer with Ivory white top. All these articles are neatly contained in a moire-lined, genuine black leather case, measuring 5½ inches wide and 6 inches from end to end when opened. The case rolls up as shown in illustration, and fastens with two snap clasps. In this form it resembles a miniature pocketbook, and is just as convenient to carry, as it measures only 5½x2 inches and only 1 inch in thickness.

Although we offer this manicure set for an unusually small club, please understand that each and every piece is strictly high-grade, and regulation size. We know that every woman and girl who accepts this offer and earns one of these splendid manicure sets will be more than delighted with it. It is free on the terms of the following

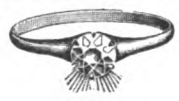
26-Piece Table Set

Yours Prepaid For A Club Of Seven



WE have in the past made many offers of table-ware, but this is the first time we have been able to offer a complete set of 26 Pieces in return for so small a club. And please don't think that because we are giving this set on liberal terms that it is plated on a brass base and consequently will change color and have that "brassy" look just as soon as the plating wears off. On the contrary, it has a white metal base; therefore each and every piece is the same color all the way through and will not show signs of wear, even after years of constant use. As shown in the above illustration, there are 26 pieces in this set—6 Knives, 6 Forks, 6 Teaspoons, 6 Tablespoons, Sugar Shell and Butter Knife. Each piece is full regulation size for family use, the handles are handsomely embossed and the blades of the knives and the bowls of the teaspoons and tablespoons are perfectly plain and bright polished. It is only because we buy this set in large quantities direct from the factory that we are able to secure it at a price that enables us to offer it as a premium for so few subscriptions. It is by far the greatest value we have offered and we guarantee every Set sent out for a period of five years. We will send this 26-Piece Table Set exactly as illustrated and described to any address upon the terms of the following special

Club Offer. For a club of seven one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you this 26-Piece Table Set free by parcel post, prepaid. Premium No. 7397.

Genuine Gold Filled

Guaranteed For 5 Years

Gold Birthstone Rings

THE most popular ladies' rings worn today are these beautiful birthstone rings. Not only is it considered lucky to wear one of them but they are now and always will be exceedingly stylish. We are able to illustrate only three of the rings but there are twelve in all—a different stone for each month of the year, and of course you should wear the stone that is symbolical of the month you were born. The following is a list of the twelve rings, names of the stones and the month to which they apply:

No. 8411, January, Garnet. No. 8421, February, Amethyst. No. 8431, March, Bloodstone. No. 8441, April, Diamond. No. 8451, May, Emerald. No. 8461, June, Agate. No. 8471, July, Ruby. No. 8481, August, Sardonyx. No. 8491, September, Sapphire. No. 8501, October, Opal. No. 8511, November, Topaz. No. 8521, December, Turquoise.

Each ring is guaranteed genuine gold filled, which looks exactly like solid gold and will wear for years. In fact we absolutely guarantee each ring for at least five years. The rings themselves are perfectly plain, the stones are solitaires and perfect imitations of the real gems. The setting of each ring is the ever popular "Tiffany" style. As a Christmas, Birthday or all-the-year-round gift for wife, mother, sweetheart or sister, nothing could be more appropriate and acceptable than one of these beautiful guaranteed rings set with the birthstone of the person to whom it is given. We will send you one of these rings free upon the terms of the following offer:

Given To You! For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents we will send you one of these beautiful gold-filled Rings by parcel post, prepaid. Please be sure to give size and number of ring wanted.

Three Beautiful PEONIES

WHITE - PINK - RED

GORGEOUS, yearly-blooming Peonies—the rival of the finest roses in size, form and color. The three varieties offered you here require but little care and attention after once being planted; they thrive anywhere, even in the coldest climates, and produce more and more flowers every season. We will send you the roots, packed in damp moss, direct from the greenhouse. You can put them in the ground at once and next summer you will know the pleasure and satisfaction of having a beautiful garden of peonies in the most glorious shades of white, pink and red. The three different varieties sent you free on this offer include

Couronne d'Or A white, semi-rose Peony that blooms in early summer, bearing immense, very full, imbricated, ball-shaped blossoms which are very solid and compactly built from edge to center. Their color is a snow-white, reflecting golden-yellow stamens that show through the petals when looking at the flower from the side. These stamens light up the whole flower with a glow that is simply indescribable and which suggests its name, "Crown of Gold." Delicate carmine pencilings also appear on the edges of a few central petals. This variety is incomparably lovely and one of the best and choicest Peonies in culture.

Mademoiselle Desbuissons A pink semi-rose Peony that blooms in mid-season. Its flowers are very large, full and elegantly shaped, imbricated and flat with extra large petals of a tender, glossy pink color. The center is a delicate waxy white, the guards a handsome violet-rose color. Flower lovers pronounce this one of the most beautiful varieties.

L'Ecletante A red Bomb type Peony that blooms well into the summer. Its blossoms are very double and full. The color is a deep, brilliant, velvety-crimson. This variety makes a stately and handsome plant, every flower standing up straight and erect, well above the foliage. It is considered as one of the finest red Peonies ever grown.

The roots of these plants are all extra strong and each one contains from two to five eyes. We guarantee that they will reach you in a healthy-growing condition, ready to be placed in the ground and that they will positively bloom next season. If for any reason they do not—or if they should otherwise prove unsatisfactory—we will replace them for you free of all cost.

As the best season for planting Peonies is right now, you should send in your order at once. We will send you these three above described varieties—one white, one pink and one red—free upon the terms of the following special

CLUB OFFER! For three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you the healthy, well-formed roots of the three beautiful varieties of Peonies described above, free by parcel post, prepaid. They will be mailed, carefully packed, direct from the greenhouse, and delivered to you in perfect condition, all ready for planting. Premium No. 8983.

We Give You The Bag-Top —You Make The Bag!

THESE pretty home-made bags are all the go now. Their great popularity is due to the fact that as each woman makes her own bag it is sure to be distinctive—a little different from other women's bags. It is very easy to make and inexpensive. You probably have the material on hand right now—odds and ends of silk, velvet or moire, whatever you decide to use. The tassel on the bottom is not necessary but you can easily afford to buy one as they cost only a few cents. Or you can make it yourself.

The bag-top offered you here is seven inches wide, made of handsome oxidized metal with a very deeply embossed floral design. It is the "gate-top" style—that is, each side opens out in the middle so that it really has four sides as shown in the illustration. It is also perforated along the edge with small holes to take the stitches necessary for attaching the bag. The chain is fourteen inches long.

Our Free Offer. For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will send you this handsome and stylish Bag-Top free by parcel post, prepaid. Premium No. 9692.

Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Let Us Send You A Suit

Made to your measure, payable after received, with the clear understanding that if the fit is not perfect or if you are not satisfied in every way, if you are not convinced you have received a fine, high grade, stylish, perfect-fitting tailored suit made to your measures and have saved $15 to $20, you are not under the slightest obligation to keep it.

Don't hesitate or feel timid, simply send the suit back, no cost to you. You are not out one penny. Any money you may have paid us is refunded at once.

SAMPLES FREE

Any man young or old interested in saving money, who wants to dress well and not feel extravagant is invited to write us for our free book of samples and fashions explaining everything. Please write letter or postal today, just say "Send me your samples" and get our whole proposition by return mail. Try it—costs you nothing—just a postal, get the free samples and prices anyway. "Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

Through the columns of this department free information pertaining to Etiquette, Personal Appearance and kindred subjects will be given in answer to questions by our subscribers, but not more than two questions the same month by any one subscriber. Address Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and give your own full name and address. Name will not be published.

E. W., Thief River Falls, Minn.—If a boy is "mad" because you have rightly refused to allow him to kiss you, our advice is to let him remain just as mad as he likes and for just as long a time.

I. M., Hale Center, Texas.—You have a right to greet your fiancee with a kiss, but it would be best not to do this in so public a place as a railroad station. (2) You may make what gifts you wish to the girl you expect to marry, but it would be rather unusual for you to offer to pay for all her clothing unless she was financially unable to furnish her own wardrobe.

C. L. M., Warriot, Ala.—We were certain of your age before we found it stated at the end of your letter. It is always the girl of sixteen who thinks her own way must be better than the advice of her mother. You must obey your parents' wishes in regard to these automobile rides, and continue your education a few years longer until you are wiser than you now believe yourself to be.

POLLYANNA, Stanton, Tenn.—A young man who has asked a girl to marry him and then breaks an engagement with his fiancee in favor of another girl, should be placed on the unengaged and undesirable list as promptly as possible.

G. B., Boley, Okla.—You do not make your first question plain. (2) You may go with your friend to call on a girl with whom he is acquainted, even though this girl is a complete stranger to you.

CUTIE, Texas.—If this young man has told all your friends he "likes" you, it would seem possible that if you act just as nicely to him as you have been doing he may soon tell you that he "loves" you. (2) It would be best for you to keep your hands in front of you, despite the crowded condition of the automobile.

G. L. P., Ark.—If you are capable, as your letter indicates, of better opportunities and surroundings than your isolated life offers, we advise you to take some steps to get yourself out among people who might appreciate any brains or ideas which you have and help you forward. Save your money to do this, and in the meantime you will be growing a year or two older and more fitted to cope with new modes of life.

N. P. B., Kosse, Texas.—A girl of fifteen should have no love affairs but with her school books, and any time to be wasted in correspondence with boys should be spent on lessons in English and composition. We are glad your mother is wise enough to advise you correctly.

I. W., Collins, Mo.—Waiting for a man who talks much about love but nothing about marriage is discouraging and uncertain. If this suitor of yours was really serious in his protestations of affections, we believe he would have asked you to become his wife before this. Marriage is too important a contract to be based upon any other judgment than your own, but we can state decisively that any earnest would-be fiance in Oklahoma should be worth several fickle Missouri lovers such as the one you write about—and seem to love through all his fickleness.

L. H. R., Brookside, Ala.—There are many restaurants and cafes frequented only by men. In such places as these, many men do not remove their hats while lunching. In any eating-place, however, where ladies are present or may enter, a man must remove his hat.

A WEST TEXAS CAMPFIRE GIRL.—The average girl of your age is about five feet, one inch in height and weighs 106 pounds. For your unusual inches you should weigh about 144 pounds. (2) A boy should not "squeeze" a girl's hand at a moving picture theater, nor should she give him the opportunity to take this liberty.

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not related to the special departments elsewhere in the paper will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

T. S. L., Middlebrook, Ark.—There are only 37,740 acres of vacant public land remaining in the state of Alabama. Doubtless the greater part of this is unfit for agricultural purposes without some form of reclamation. The one U. S. Land Office in Alabama is located at Montgomery, where Cato D. Glover is Register. Florida numbers 117,784 government acres. The only land office is at Gainesville and R. W. Davis serves as Register. Write to him for further information such as you ask of this department.

MRS. W. B. H., McCaskill, Ark.—Your meat must be kept free from all possible contact with insects from the time of butchering. Have each portion you prepare for storage carefully bagged in cloth which has been wet with a strong borax solution and then dried.

MRS. C. J. V., Vernon, Texas.—We cannot encourage your belief in the genuineness of your "old violin." We believe that this instrument is one in which a fraudulent inscription has been placed, and that it was not made over three hundred years ago by Antonius Stradivarius. Violin experts list only about thirty genuine "Strads." Have you never read what has been so often stated in this column regarding "old violins" and the faked inscriptions of unscrupulous dealers?

J. P. S., West Hartford, Ark.—There are simple metal devices to be obtained in any good hardware store which effectively prevent a cow from sucking her own milk or that of other cows. (2) We advise you not to embark in the retail fish business in western Arkansas.

R. T. B., Koshkonong, Mo.—See answer to Mrs. C. J. V., Vernon, Texas, in this column. There are not as many false Stainers as there are Strads—but there are a great many of them. We regret that we must regard your instrument as one of these imitations. Victor S. Fletcher, 500 Fifth Avenue, New York City, is an authority on old violins.

F. B., Scobey, Mont.—If you have your brother's former address at Fort Liscom, Alaska, write to him there—giving his company and regiment as part of the address. If you do this and fail of answer, write with full particulars to the Adjutant General's Office, Washington, D. C. Place your own address in the upper left-hand corner of any letter you may send to Alaska.

V. E., Monette, Mo.—You need no diploma to commence the keeping of books. What you do require is a proper knowledge of debit and credit and single and double entry. If you have this as a result of your high school course, you may set to work at once—if you can find any merchant willing to trust your ability and accuracy.

B. K., Spring Grove, Pa.—A girl must give her correct name at the time of marriage. Do not attempt to commence under false colors anything so important as married life.

MRS. L. M. T., Mich.—The root of the plant commonly known as Indian Turnip, is produced by nature in too large quantities to be commercially valuable.

MRS. C. J. K., Schulenburg, Texas.—The proportions of one, three and five of cement, sand and gravel, respectively, will make a satisfactory concrete. (2) We prefer not to give you instructions regarding the making of gunpowder at home. This is dangerous work. (3) An acre contains 4,840 square yards.

MRS. G. P., Albany, Ala.—There are many large hospitals where satisfactory applicants are received for training as nurses. Such applicants become "probationers" and are paid a small monthly wage. You would require at least two years of hospital work before gaining sufficient training, and it would much increase your success and future earning capacity if you could complete your high school education before commencing upon your prospective profession. We could not tell you if a hospital you might enter as probationer would consider treating your two-year-old invalid child. This would be a matter to be passed upon by the superintendent of the institution.

MRS. E. E. S., Kittery, Me.—The Illustrated Companion is published from 96 Chambers Street, New York City.

J. L. D., Tenaha, Texas.—See answer to Mrs. C. J. V., Vernon, Texas, in this column.

MRS. A. C., Billings, Mo.—We can only suggest that you submit your manuscript to periodicals whose pages contain stories of the sort you have written. Be sure and enclose stamps for return postage. It is much easier to turn out a literary product than it is to sell it—as thousands of other would-be authors can confirm.

Through the columns of this department subscribers may have free advice from our eminent legal adviser on all questions of law except divorce matters.

Address Home Lawyer, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

MRS. M. L., Missouri.—We do not think your neighbor has any legal right to divert the natural course of drainage of the water you mention so that it overflows your field and injures your property.

S. S., Ohio.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that, in cases where the parents are separated, the courts have power to award the custody of the children to whichever of the parents the welfare of the children would seem to dictate. If the evidence discloses that the father is a man of bad character the courts have power to award the custody to the mother, and direct the father to furnish support for the small children.

C. M., Arkansas.—If the deed of the property you mention stands in your father's name, we think that upon his death, without a will, your mother would be entitled to a dower interest of one third of the real estate for life and one third of the personal estate absolutely, the balance of the estate going to all of your father's children in equal shares.

MRS. J. P. McG., West Virginia.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the consent of parents or guardian is necessary for the marriage of females under 21 years of age.

MRS. R. F. C., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if the real estate you mention stands in the name of the husband alone, the wife has no perfected interest in the property unless she survives the husband, in which event she will be entitled to a share of the same from which he cannot bar her by will; if the property is deeded to the husband and wife as tenants by the entirety, the whole property upon the death of one becomes the sole property of the survivor.

MRS. H. W. S., Montana.—We can form no opinion as to the validity of your husband's title to the property you mention without an examination of the title and all the agreements and other instruments in connection therewith; we think in purchasing real estate you should have the title examined by some competent authority before taking title and before you pay for the property.

MRS. C. M. B., Missouri.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the parents of the small children you mention can be compelled to support them in the proper court action or proceedings brought for that purpose, but it will be necessary to locate such parents before proceeding against them.

MRS. J. J., North Carolina.—There is no law providing pensions for Confederate soldiers or their widows.

MRS. J. H. M., Arkansas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the deed of the husband alone would not convey good title of real estate belonging to the wife.

M. C. M., North Dakota.—We think you should communicate with the superintendent of schools of your county as to the requirements for school teachers in your locality.

MRS. E. D. McC., Iowa.—Under the laws of California we are of the opinion that if your brother left no will and left no widow, and no child or descendant, his estate would all go to the parent who survived him, in case one of the parents is dead.

MRS. T. M. D., Minnesota.—If the crime committed by the man you mention is of sufficient importance to be an extraditable offense, we think he can be brought back from Canada.

MRS. W. T., Montana.—We think that your creditor can enforce the payment of your debt to him against any property you may own, not exempt by law from levy under execution but that he cannot enforce the payment of this debt until the same matures or until there is some default in the payment due him when the same becomes due. We do not think he is limited in his collection of his claim to the property covered by mortgage given to secure the debt.

MISS B. R., Texas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that both males and females become of full age at twenty-one years; females under twenty-one years of age, who may marry in accordance with the laws of the state, are deemed of full age at the time of marriage.

J. S. B., Missouri.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that, if your wife was legally adopted under the judgment or decree of a proper court in your state, she will have the same inheritance rights from the estates of her foster parents as the children born to the marriage, but if there was no court proceeding in connection with her adoption she will have no inheritance rights from her foster parents' estates unless some provision is made for her by will. We think that her foster parents can cut off by will any share she may be entitled to receive in case she was legally adopted, if they desire to do so.

R. W., Connecticut.—We think you should have your deed examined by some local attorney; we can form no opinion as to written instruments without an examination of them.

M. B. D., Nebraska.—We do not think the statement made by your son at the time of his marriage will affect his legitimacy nor will it affect the validity of his marriage.

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs fifty-five cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The fifty-five cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C.," a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, so after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

How to become a Member

Send fifty-five cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine, with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

Read Uncle Charlie's Poems Around the Fireside!

The long winter nights are upon us, and the best fireside companion is a copy of Uncle Charlie's Poems. You will laugh, you will scream, you will yell, if you peruse its uproariously funny pages. This 160-page cloth-bound volume contains the best recitations in the world, also a deeply interesting sketch of Uncle Charlie's life and splendid pictures of him dictating his monthly talks to Maria. This book free for a club of only three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each.

Uncle Charlie's Song Book is Just Grand!

So our readers say with monotonous regularity. It contains 28 of the dandiest songs ever written, coon songs, sacred songs, sentimental and story ballads. Full music for voice and piano. Five dollars' worth of music for only two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each. A gorgeous song folio with superb cover on which appear some splendid pictures of Uncle Charlie at various stages of his career. Both volumes free for a club of five. Work for them today!

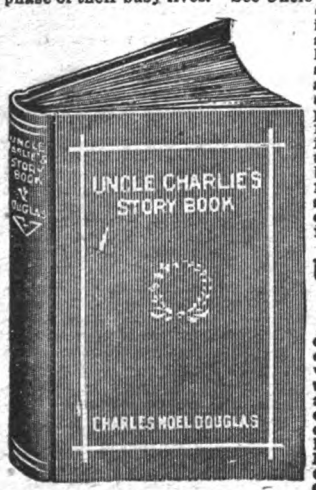
Remedies

IRRITANT POISONS.—Such poisons irritate but do not corrode parts they touch. No staining; metallic taste; burning of mouth and throat and in stomach, straining, vomiting and purging. Shock.



IRRITANT POISONS.—Those which do not stain and for which an emetic is given. Tartar emetic, blue stone, Paris green, lead, corrosive sublimate (antiseptic tablets), phosphorus and arsenic (rat poison and other vermin killers); poisonous plants.

Treatment:—
1. Emetic.
2. Dilute poison and soothe parts.
3. Stimulants.
2. To dilute and soothe: Give large quantities of water, milk, flour and water or eggs beaten up, or oils, such as olive, salad, sardine, linseed, castor or cod liver oil. Do not give oil in cases of phosphorus poisoning.
3. Stimulants: Strong tea or coffee, ammonia or alcohol.

3 Wheel Chairs in August

566 Is COMFORT'S Total to Date

The three August wheel chairs go to Rolly Sherry, Bay City, Texas, 136: Allen Laricy, R. R. 4, Vidalia, Ga., 96; Mrs. Fannie Mitchell, R. R. 4, Box 106, Frankfort, Ky., 86. The figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends for them.

Rolly Sherry, age six, can not walk or even sit alone. His right hand is paralyzed and his spine is affected, caused by sickness in infancy which left him in his present condition.

Allen Laricy, age 13, has been a cripple from birth. He can sit but cannot stand, and it is doubtful whether he has sufficient use of his hands to wheel himself about in a wheel chair.

Mrs. Fannie Mitchell, age 64, has suffered severely from rheumatism the past eleven years which has so crippled her that she has very little use of her legs and hands which are badly drawn and stiffened. Can not wash or dress herself or comb her own hair. Her husband, too, is an invalid afflicted with a bad lung trouble.

The COMFORT wheel chairs which I am sending them will prove great blessings to these three helpless cripples and very helpful to those who have to wait on them.

On our waiting list are many other helpless, crippled shut-ins suffering for a much needed wheel chair which they are too poor to buy; their only hope of getting one is through COMFORT'S Wheel-Chair Club. Do your bit this month to help them get one. Better still, get your name in next month's Roll of Honor.

You will be interested in the following letters of thanks and Roll of Honor.

Sincerely yours,

W. H. GANNETT,

Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 150 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 50 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

Can Go Most Anywhere She Wishes in Her Wheel Chair

Hartford, Ala.

Dear Mr. Gannett:

Enclosed I am sending you a picture of myself in my wheel chair for use in COMFORT. Words can never express my heart-felt thanks to you and all who helped me get my chair. I can now enjoy myself outdoors and with its help I can go most anywhere I wish to. How I wish every shut-in could have the pleasure of enjoying one of your wheel chairs. Many, many thanks, again, to you and all.

Your loving little friend,

Annie Laura Lewis.

Enjoys Her Wheel Chair

McAdams, Miss.

Dear Mr. Gannett:

I received my wheel chair in May and I enjoy it so much that words can not express my appreciation of it. I would that every poor cripple in this Christian land had a wheel chair. May God bless you in the good work you are doing.

Very respectfully,

(Mrs.) Kiziah Scruggs.

Greatly Enjoys Her COMFORT Wheel Chair

Vienna, La.

Dear Mr. Gannett:

Enclosed is a picture of my little crippled girl, Fannie Margaret Ball, who was awarded a wheel chair through COMFORT last May. She greatly enjoys her chair, and we, her parents, are very thankful to COMFORT for making it possible for her to get the chair, and to her many friends who assisted.

Respectfully,

(Mrs.) K. E. Ball.

COMFORT'S Roll of Honor

The Roll of Honor comprises the names of those who have sent five or more subscriptions, or a dollar or more in money, to credit of the Wheel-Chair Club during the month previous. Following each name is the number of subscriptions sent.

A Good Shot

"I may be late home tonight, dear," said Jones. "You won't miss me, will you?"

"Not if I see you first," replied Mrs. Jones, as she glanced towards the rolling pin on the kitchen table. —Portland Express.

Freaks

One day we heard a sideshow freak
Most bitterly complain:
The broken glass he ate that week
Gave him a brand new pane.
—Springfield Union.

The touchy guttapercha man
Was heard to softly blubber:
"I like to peep where'er I can,
But folks will holler 'Rubber'!"
—Youngstown Telegram

And Zeke, the living skeleton,
Expresses his chagrin
That his one chance to gain a pile
Should be so very thin.
—Richmond Times-Dispatch.

And Mame, the fat girl in the show,
Alas did realize
Her only chance for easy dough
Depended on her size.
—Portland Express.

A Nasty Knock

Percy—"What would you do if you were a man?"

Phyllis—"I don't know. What would you do?"—Portland Express.

The Jealous Cats

"What makes Ina disliked so?"

"She received the most votes in the popular girl contest."

A Scanty Costume

Waiting only to slip on a pair of shoes the deputy hurried from the house with a double-barrelled shotgun.—From our favorite newspaper of April 7.

Good Place for the Kaiser

Lucy, as a special privilege for "being good," had been promised a trip to the Zoo. "What is the Zoo?" asked Lucy. "Why, dear," explained her mother, "that's where they keep wild animals, tigers and lions." "Oh," interrupted Lucy, "and will you show me the Kaiser?"

Not the Only One

Gladys—"So she was disappointed in love."

Gertrude—"Yes, before she married him she thought he had money."

No Wonder He Lost

LOST—A boneheaded man's umbrella in waiting room. Apply, etc.—Adv. in Springfield Union.

His Flattery Didn't Go

Hubby—"Your hair, my dear, is your crowning glory."

Wifey—"That's all right, but I need a new winter hat just the same."

Paradoxical Matches

Those penny safety matches—they now are all alike;
You pay two cents a box for them and none of them will strike.
—Philadelphia Inquirer.

It seems to us a paradox—the way those matches shirk;
For if they are not on a strike, then why do they not work?
—Portland Express.

Quite Right

Creditor—"You couldn't ride around in your fine automobile if you paid your honest debts."

Debtor—"That's so. I'm glad you look at it in the same light as I do."—Kennebec Journal.

In More Ways than One

A belle is incomplete without a ring
When young;
Alas we find out later on she also has
A tongue.

He Was Wise Perhaps

Doctor—"Why didn't you call me before your husband became unconscious?"

Wife of Patient—"Because he wouldn't let me while he had his senses."

These Rugs Are All Full Room Size 9 ft. x 12 ft. Very Attractive Patterns

Send Only $1

One dollar brings any one of the four wonderful rug bargains shown above for 30 days' trial in your home. If after a month's actual use of the rug you select, you are not delighted with the remarkable value and thoroughly satisfied to keep it at our low money-saving price, return it to us and we will not only refund your $1, but will also pay transportation charges both ways. If you decide to buy the rug, take nearly a year to pay—a little each month that you will hardly miss.

Amazing Rug Bargains

It is practically impossible to do justice to these extremely handsome and attractive rugs by mere description and cold black and white illustrations as shown above. Ornamental design, luxuriant texture and rich colorings must be seen to be fully appreciated. That's why we offer to send your choice of any of these four beautiful rugs for 30 days' use in your home. Read the descriptions carefully, then make your choice for the 30-day trial test at our risk.

RUG No. 1 Genuine Gold Seal one-piece, seamless, Congoleum Art Rug. The name Congoleum is in floor coverings a positive standard of quality. This rug is guaranteed by Hartman as first grade Congoleum. Very sanitary. Contains no burlap. Water will not injure it. Damp mop keeps it clean and bright. Durable and wear-resisting. Lies flat without fastening. Sun and storm-proof. Wonderful rug for dining room, kitchen, sun porch, etc. The Gold Seal is pasted on its face as visible evidence that it is genuine, and name Congoleum is stamped on back. 9x12 ft. size. Order by No. 51BBMA45. Price $19. Send only $1 now. Balance $2 monthly.

RUG No. 2 A splendid reversible standard size, 9 ft. x 12 ft. wool and fibre rug made of carefully selected vegetable fibre and wool, woven into a rarely artistic oriental pattern of rich coloring. Test this wonderful rug bargain on your floor for 30 days at our risk. Order by No. 17BBMA20. Price $23.65. Send only $1 now; balance $2.50 monthly.

RUG No. 3 Here is a decidedly exceptional value in a full size 9 ft. x 12 ft. Tapestry Brussels Rug with mitered corners in an unusually attractive pattern. An extra serviceable floor covering that will give splendid wear and make a handsome appearance in any room.

Order by No. 22BBMA8. Price $28.95. $1.00 now; balance $2.75 monthly.

RUG No. 4 A Magnificent Medallion Pattern Tapestry Brussels Rug woven to give service. Just think of the low price at which we offer this handsome tapestry Brussels rug. Combination of colorings blends most charmingly, and the design into which it is woven gives it a very attractive appearance, as the illustration plainly shows. The medallion center is very rich and pleasing, as is the neatly arranged conservative border. It is closely woven and the yarns used in the making are selected for their wearing qualities. Made in 9 x 12 ft. size and guaranteed to give you absolute satisfaction.

Order by No. 22BBMA17. Price $29.85. Send only $1.00 now; balance $2.75 monthly.

Nearly Full Year to Pay

When you see any of these rugs on your floor, and study the splendid quality, ornate pattern and beautiful color scheme, you will be delighted. THOUGHTS THAT BREATHE AND WORDS THAT BURN

With the Arrest of Charles Ponzi the Biggest, Boldest, Wildest Get-Rich-Quick Scheme Ever Known Has Collapsed

Profiteers in Panic over Fall in Price of Sugar

IT is common knowledge, as previously explained in these columns, that President Wilson's neglect and refusal, a year ago, to permit the Sugar Equalization Board to take the necessary action to protect the interests of the people opened wide the door for all manner of speculation and profiteering in sugar, and is responsible for the outrageously high levels to which the price of that necessary article of food has been boosted. In the summer of 1919 under regulation of the Sugar Equalization Board granulated sugar retailed at eleven to twelve cents a pound, but in the fall, after the Board's authority had been withdrawn, the price began to rise and kept climbing until it ranged from twenty-five to thirty cents during the past summer in spite of numerous threats and some few feeble attempts at prosecution of profiteers.

This doubling and nearly trebling of price cost our people hundreds of millions of dollars which went to swell the enormous profits of producers and dealers in Cuba and in the United States who could afford to take the chance of paying a fine if caught. But in so doing they finally overdid the trick and overreached themselves, for they put the price so high—so very much higher here than in other countries—that, despite a world shortage of sugar, large shipments have been attracted from all sugar-producing countries, even those that never before sent us their product. These unexpected shipments began to arrive in late spring and increased through the summer. Another unexpected result of the excessively high price was that our people curtailed their consumption and, as in the case of high-price clothing, to a large extent stopped buying

Consequently about the middle of August the American market became glutted with an oversupply of sugar and the price began to drop under pressure of foreign competition, and a week later imported sugar was being sold in New York at fifteen cents a pound. Would-be profiteers who were hoarding sugar began to worry as they saw their expected profits vanishing or even a possible loss looming in the near future, and banks which are financing large sugar holdings are said to be getting uneasy over the situation and likely to curtail credits and thereby force such holders to dump their sugar stocks on the market.

Since the Sugar Equalization Board ceased to function at the close of last year Attorney General Palmer, at the head of the Department of Justice, has been trying to keep the price of sugar within bounds by prosecuting profiteers when discovered. This work has been under the special charge of his assistant, John F. Crosby, acting head of the Department's crusade to cut down the cost of living. On August 20 Mr. Crosby announced that sugar dealers had appealed to the Department officials to save them from breaking prices of the product. Experts declare that the sugar profiteers have brought these troubles on themselves. After the merciless profits they have extorted from the people it would be strangely inconsistent for the Department of Justice, which has boasted so loudly of its efforts to curb their greed, now to turn about and help them hold up the present exorbitant price of sugar. The people, who have suffered so much by the rise, will have little sympathy for them if in the fall of prices these hoarders, manipulators and speculators lose part or all of their profits, or even more, and would hardly tolerate any interference by the Government to prevent the natural action of the law of supply and demand from operating to reduce the price of food.

An official of a leading sugar firm in Boston says that the retail price of sugar will drop radically within a short time—quite likely to fifteen and possibly to ten cents a pound, the latter only in case of a stampede by overloaded dealers to unload. The Cuban producers achieved such success in raising the price last year that they had under serious consideration a plan to raise sugar prices again the coming season, as they thought the United States was dependent on them and at their mercy for its sugar supply until the sugar was poured into our market in such quantities from other countries the past summer. But this competition has caused the Cubans to drop instead of raising their price.

"Ponzied" Finance

IN mid-summer Charles Ponzi, with headquarters in Boston, blazed into sudden notoriety as the author and promoter of a get-rich-quick scheme that by its gigantic proportions, bold aggressiveness, extravagant claims and mysterious workings dazzled the public and amazed and puzzled the financiers of the world and worried, not only our State and Federal authorities, but also the principal European governments. This publicity precipitated a joint investigation of his scheme and business methods by the Attorney General of Massachusetts and the Post-Office Department with the result that about the middle of August his sky-rocket financial career was brought to an abrupt and disastrous close by his arrest and commitment to jail on criminal proceedings under both State and Federal laws; under the former charging him with obtaining money by false pretenses and under the latter alleging that he used the mails for fraudulent purposes. Immediately following this he was adjudged bankrupt and the court ordered his property and funds to be taken over by receivers to be administered for the benefit of his creditors. The work of searching for his assets in bankruptcy is progressing under authority of the U. S. District Court while Attorney General Allen, of Massachusetts, is gathering information as to his indebtedness. Data thus far obtained are reported to indicate liabilities of between five and six million dollars and comparatively small assets.

Ponzi is an Italian. He claims to be highly educated and of good family. In a published interview he is reported to have said that in his youth, though not wealthy, he was possessed of ample means but developed spendthrift habits in college which soon reduced him to the necessity of going to work for a living, and not wishing thus to humiliate himself in the eyes of his friends and acquaintances he emigrated to America, landing in Boston with only two dollars and a half in his pocket. He worked in various cities from Boston to Florida and at different occupations, mostly, it seems, as a restaurant or hotel waiter. Even up to eight months prior to his recent arrest he was clerking for moderate wages and had not become a capitalist. At about that time he conceived and began to put in execution his unique get-rich-quick proposition which in less than half a year brought into his possession and control millions of other people's dollars and made him for a few weeks the most conspicuous and most talked of man in the World.

Omitting details, the scheme which, according to his pretensions, was bringing him such quick riches and warranted his promise of such alluring returns to those who invested their money with him, may be summarized as a peculiar method, which he claimed to have discovered, of dealing in foreign exchange and foreign return postage coupons so as to realize tremendous profits by taking advantage of the depreciated values of the currencies of certain European countries. The inducement that he held out to the public was the promise of fifty per cent. profit for the use of a depositor's money for ninety days. From the start his proposition was favorably received by the Italian residents of Boston and money began to flow to him in an ever increasing stream. To each depositor he gave his note promising to pay in ninety days an amount fifty per cent. in excess of the sum deposited. However, he did not wait for his first notes to mature but in forty-five days called them and paid in full, including the fifty per cent. profit.

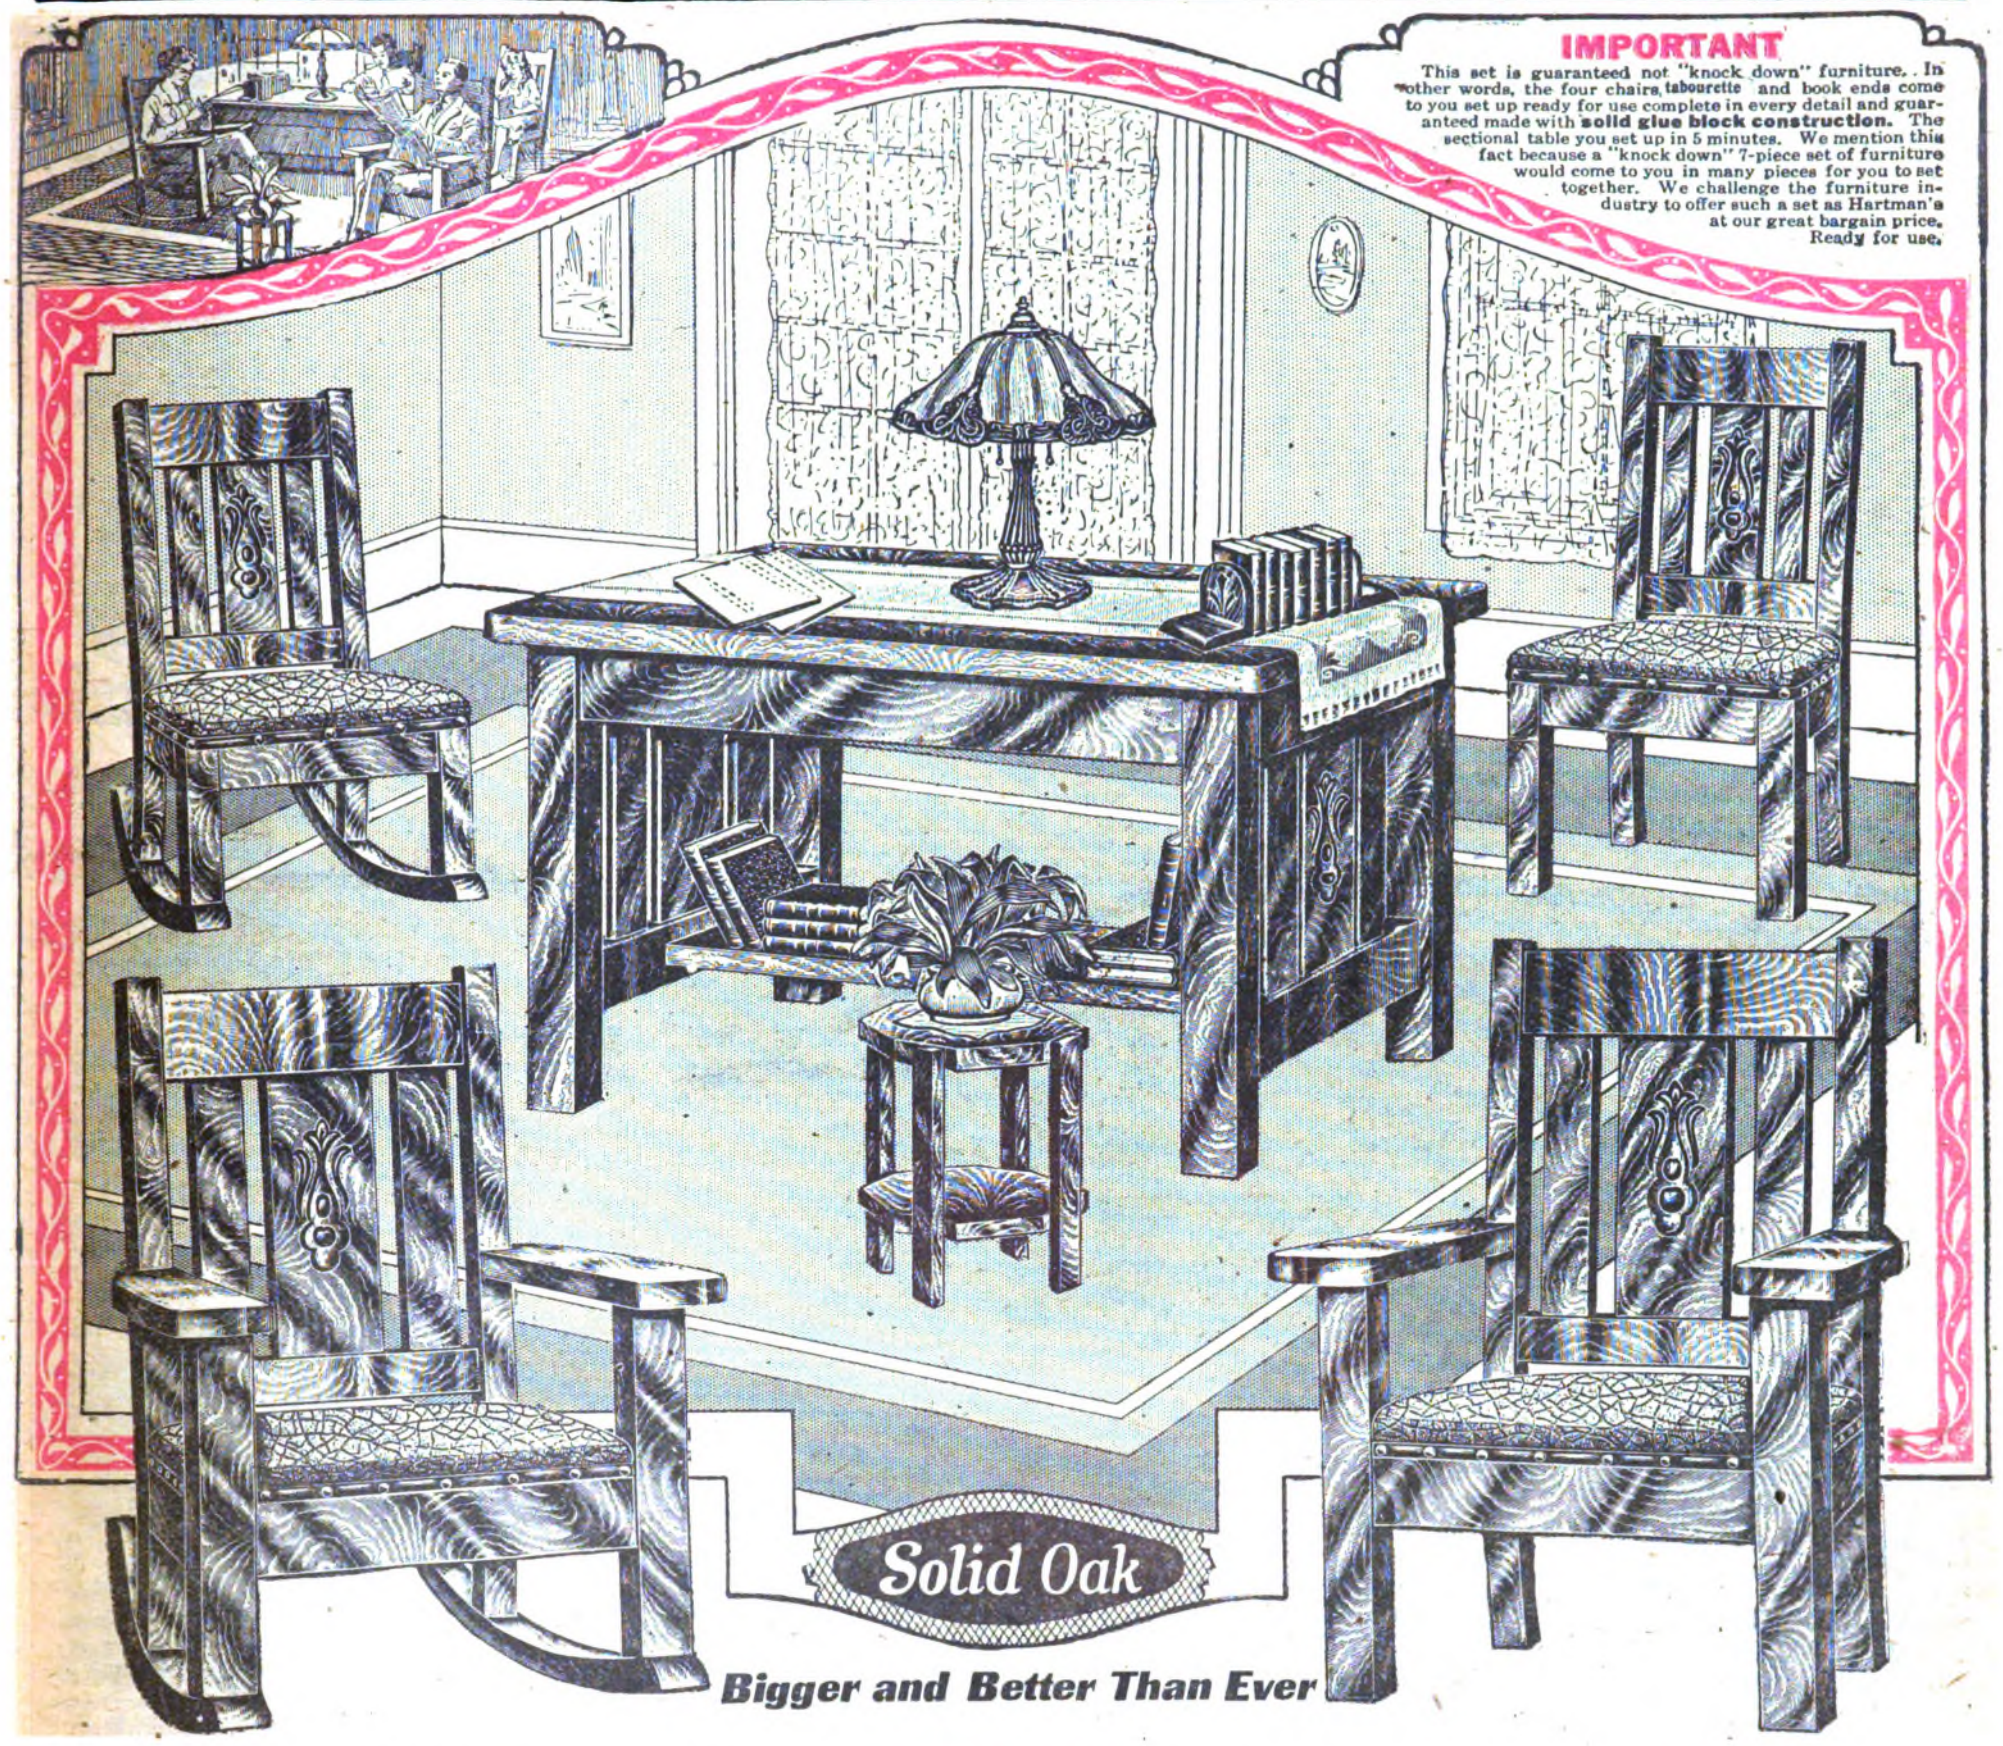
No more captivating proof of the success of his venture could have been devised and the fame of it spread like wild fire. His office became thronged by a crush of depositors eager to invest, and the money which they left with him soon mounted up into the millions. To accommodate his rapidly growing business he opened another Boston office and established branch offices in other New England cities. With millions of other people's money at his command he was soon reputed to be a multi-millionaire, and he adopted a luxurious style of living that measured up with his supposed wealth.

Such was the situation as to the public, and such the outward appearance of his affairs when the investigation by the State and Federal authorities cast suspicion on his business methods and called in question the legitimacy of his scheme. The first effect was to cause timid holders of his notes to crowd his offices and demand the immediate return of their money. Day after day during the early stages of the investigation Ponzi and his clerks met the demands of all customers that desired the return of their money before their notes were due by paying to each the amount of his or her deposit, but, of course, without the fifty per cent. bonus which was not due because the specified time of payment had not then arrived. Ponzi also gave repeated assurance that he had ample funds to meet all his obligations and leave him a substantial surplus over and above his liabilities. The confidence of his clients was soon restored, the run practically stopped and many new customers presented themselves for the purpose of investing their money with him. The State authorities refused to allow Ponzi to accept any more deposits pending the investigation. His arrest and the closing of his business soon followed, as previously described.

Another unfortunate consequence of this financial debacle is the closing of a Boston bank by order of the Massachusetts Bank Commissioner on the ground that it is involved in Ponzi's affairs to an extent that has impaired its capital. Last spring Ponzi bought a large interest in the capital stock of this bank and became one of the directors.

Ponzi still asserts that if allowed two months in which to straighten out his business he will be able to pay all his debts in full. But his statement carried no weight with the officials who are sifting his affairs because he fails to show them the resources or explain the means by which such a result could reasonably be expected to be worked out.

No one knows just what Ponzi's scheme was or whether he had any definite plan of investment or speculation. Financial experts say that there is nothing in the foreign exchange and reply coupon postage proposition which he represented to his clients as the basis of his great wealth-producing plan, and thus far no evidence has been discovered to indicate that he operated to any considerable extent on those lines. Since his troubles began he has not divulged any rational plan of investment or speculation that in the judgment of the State and Federal authorities would honestly warrant the representations and promises that he made to those who entrusted their money to him on faith. In fact they base the criminal prosecutions which they have instituted against him on the charge that he obtained money from his clients by fraudulent means.



The enormous profits that he claimed to be making and the high rate of interest (50% for

Audrey's Recompense

by Mrs. Georgie Sheldon

"Who are you? What is your name?"

"Blue Blood!" She muttered, almost fiercely.

The letter was brief, but fairly worded.

"Wait" he said, until Audrey is eighteen.

CHAPTER I.

WHAT AUDREY FOUND.

THE twilight of a midsummer day was setting over a quiet, beautiful town not far from the metropolis of New York.

A little away from the town there was an elegant residence—the pride of the whole country around—and this, with its finely kept grounds, which had something of the air of an English park, seemed almost like a paradise.

A rich, deep-toned bell upon a distant church-tower tolled eight musical notes, and as the last stroke echoed on the evening air, a slender, graceful figure, clad in somber black, arose from a rustic seat near a marble fountain, not far from the mansion and walked lightly across the green-sward to the smoothly graveled walk which led to the house.

The walk was bordered with magnificent trees and their heavy foliage, meeting above it seemed to enwrap Audrey Waldemar in sudden gloom as she came into it.

All at once she stopped and raised her head—a regal head it was, too—and the pose of her whole figure at that moment proclaimed the lady of noble breeding and high culture.

And such, in truth, was the only daughter of the late Hon. Dudley Waldemar, a wealthy gentleman, a retired politician, and a man of the noblest stamp.

"What was that noise? What did I hear?" she murmured, and the tone was clear and musical.

She stood listening for a moment, and a low, sobbing sound came distinctly to her ears. It seemed to proceed from behind a huge tree near by, and Miss Waldemar walked directly to the spot to investigate the matter.

She found there, at the foot of the tree, a little figure, lying prone upon the ground, and bitterly weeping.

Audrey Waldemar stooped and gently laid her hand upon the child's head.

With a frightened cry, he instantly sprang to his feet and stood trembling before her.

He was a little boy, perhaps five years of age.

"What is it, little one? What makes you cry so?" she asked.

"She slapped me—she called me a beggar, and told me to clear out!"

"Who slapped you? Who called you a beggar?"

"The woman with the big apron and cap," and he pointed toward Miss Waldemar's residence as he spoke.

"Why did she strike you?" she questioned, gravely.

"'Cause—I asked her—would she give me a bite."

"Are you hungry, little boy?"

"Oh, yes—so hungry!" he answered, plaintively.

"Come with me," Miss Waldemar commanded, in a low voice.

He instantly ceased his crying and went with her.

Miss Waldemar did not speak again until she had reached the broad granite steps leading up to the house.

Then she stopped beneath the great lantern which hung over them and which had just been lighted, and turning the child to the light, she asked:

"Who are you? What is your name?"

The boy lifted his head at the question, revealing a pale, pinched face, a pair of great lustrous black eyes.

"Rich," he said, in reply to her query, but regarding her with a wondering, delighted gaze, for the lamp disclosed to him a fair, beautiful face, a pair of sad yet tender blue eyes that looked at him from beneath a crown of sunny hair, which gleamed like gold between the meshes of the black lace scarf which she had thrown over her head.

"Rich?" she repeated. "That does not agree very well with the name which you say the cook called you a little while ago"—a smile flitted across her sad face at the thought—"Rich what?" she added, inquiringly.

"I don't know—that is all," he answered, briefly.

"Where do you live?"

"With Madge. Over there by the mill," he returned, with a motion of his hand to indicate some spot quite distant from the mansion.

Miss Waldemar sighed. It was evident that she could not obtain much information from him.

"Well, never mind, we must not forget that you are hungry," she said, and, turning, led him into the house.

A cry of wonder and delight burst from him as he entered the lofty, beautiful hall, with its inlaid floor, and rich rugs scattered here and there; its great chandelier all ablaze with light, and the rare pictures and carvings which met his view.

Evidently it was like an enchanted palace to this poor little waif, and a flush of interest lighted Audrey Waldemar's face as she marked his pleasure and appreciation of the beautiful things around him.

She led him up the richly carpeted stairs to the second floor, where she encountered a servant, who uttered an exclamation of amazement as she saw her mistress so strangely accompanied.

"It is only a little boy who is hungry, Martha," Miss Waldemar explained, adding: "Come and wash his face and hands for me, then I will take him down and give him something to eat."

The child did not demur, but submitted to the cleansing process as if he really enjoyed it, while he regarded his luxurious surroundings with mingled wonder and interest.

He searched the girl's face with grave curiosity, as if to find out whether she was kindly disposed toward him, and, somewhat reassured upon this point, he ventured to smooth her white apron, touching it almost affectionately, as if its spotlessness was a grateful sight to him; and when she had combed and arranged his tangled raven locks, and held him up to the mirror which was suspended above the bowl, and he saw there his own rosy face with its curling rings of hair lying thick upon his forehead, he involuntarily cried out:

"Oh! what a pretty boy!"

Miss Waldemar laughed aloud.

Her servant started and shot a glance of astonishment at her, for it was the first sound of the kind which she had known to escape Miss Waldemar's lips for long years.

"Yes, it truly is a pretty boy," she said. "But, Rich, did you never see yourself before?"

"Yes," he answered, with a sigh; "but Madge never made me look like that. Perhaps she didn't know how."

"Well, come now, and you shall have your supper," Audrey said; and turning, she left the bathroom, beckoning the maid to follow with the child.

Entering the dining-room, they came into the presence of a middle-aged woman, dressed in a genteel black silk, with a pretty lace cap on her head.

"Mrs. Allen," said Miss Waldemar, with a backward glance at her little protege, "I have invited a guest to take tea with us. I trust the little fellow will not be disagreeable to you. I found him in the avenue crying with hunger."

Mrs. Allen, Miss Waldemar's companion and chaperon, bestowed a glance of pity upon the child, then she said, gently:

"You have strange freaks, Audrey, my dear; but I am glad to see you interested in anything. But how happened he to be out in the grounds alone at this hour?"

"I will tell you about it some other time," Miss Waldemar responded, passing to her seat at the table, while she directed the servant to arrange a hassock upon a chair and lift the boy upon it.

Audrey kindly attended to his wants at once, for the hungry look in his great eyes went to her heart.

He was a remarkably interesting child, in spite of his coarse clothing and neglected appearance, and Miss Waldemar found herself watching him with increasing curiosity.

Suddenly Rich paused in the act of conveying a delicate morsel of chicken to his eager lips, and, looking up into the sweet face beside him, he said, earnestly:

"I wish Madge had come, too."

"You shall carry some to Madge when you go home, if you like," Audrey said, kindly. Then she asked: "Is Madge your mother?"

A puzzled look swept over the boy's face, then he slowly shook his head.

"No," he said; "she is nobody but Madge."

"Are you fond of her? Do you love her?"

"No," he replied, "I couldn't love Madge. She's ugly, and she shakes and whips me."

"Then why did you wish Madge could have some of this nice supper?"

"'Cause Madge gets hungry.

"Well, Rich, you shall never be hungry again while you live near me, and Madge shall not suffer, either."

The child's eyes sparkled with pleasure.

Rich grew very grave after this, and ate his custard in a very thoughtful mood. Suddenly he glanced up and around the room, his eyes lingering with a wistful gaze upon the beautiful things which surrounded him.

"I wish I could live here always," he said, at last.

What was it that made Audrey Waldemar's heart give a sudden bound within her, and an unwonted color leap into her cheeks?

Mrs. Allen, who had been quietly observing her all through the meal, smiled to herself as she saw it. She read her thought as plainly as if it had been printed in large type.

When supper was over, Audrey took her little guest into the drawing-room to let him feast his eyes upon the beautiful things there, and then sent for her coachman and told him she wished him to take the child home.

"It is too dark," she said, "for such a wee mite to be out alone, and," she added, in an undertone, "just take a look, Robert, at the woman with whom he lives, and see what you think of her."

"Oh, I know who she is, Miss Audrey," the man returned, "and it's a shame a fine little fellow should have to be brought up in such a way. The woman he belongs to is rather a respectable-looking person, but she has an ugly eye, and, I'm told, treats the child shamefully at times. They're evidently very poor, and she sends him out begging when they can't get enough to eat other ways; she takes in work from the mill when she can get it."

"Well, you can go home with him now, and tell the woman that I kept him to tea. Here comes Martha with a basket of good things as a sort of peace offering, so that she will not blame the child," Audrey said, as the girl appeared with the provisions which she had ordered to be put up for the woman.

"Rich," she said, "I shall have to send you home now, for Madge will be anxious about you."

"Oh! it is so nice here!" he said.

"Would you like to come again to see me?" she asked.

"May I come again?" he cried.

"Indeed you may."

"O-h!" and his little chest heaved with a half laugh, half sob, at the prospect.

Audrey was touched.

"Come now, dear," she said. "Robert is waiting for you; you have been a very nice boy; and to-morrow I shall go and see Madge, and ask her to allow you to come again."

The child bounded toward her, and, looking up into her face, he said in a low, earnest tone:

"Good, kind lady, I love you dearly."

Then he turned from her, walked quietly to Robert, and slipping his hand confidingly into his, he signified his readiness to go home.

CHAPTER II.

THE DAWN OF A BETTER LIFE.

True to her promise, Miss Waldemar went the next day to see her little protege, and to ascertain, if possible, something regarding his history.

Margaret Fox, for such was the woman's name, lived in a tiny house of only three rooms—two below and one above. The floors were bare, though clean. The windows were curtainless, but every pane of glass was polished until it shone like crystal. There were only two chairs, a small stove, and a table in the room into which Audrey was shown.

The woman, herself, was perhaps thirty years of age, of good figure, and possessing a not unattractive face, if it had not been marred by an ugly frown. She had dark eyes and hair, and regular though somewhat coarse features, while her manner was repulsive in the extreme.

There was not the slightest resemblance between her and Rich, who was delicately formed, and possessed a peculiar beauty. He was not visible when Miss Waldemar paid her visit, a circumstance which was very satisfactory to her, as she had come with the intention of asking Madge some very pertinent questions, which she preferred not to put in his presence.

"I am Miss Waldemar," she said, by way of introduction, "and I have come to apologize for keeping the little boy so late last evening. I hope you did not blame him."

"No; he's welcome to stay wherever he's treated well and can get enough to eat," answered the woman, curtly.

"I became greatly interested in the little fellow," Audrey pursued. "He appears to be very bright and intelligent for one of his years."

"Yes, he's bright enough," responded her companion.

"Have you ever sent him to school?"

"No."

"Perhaps you think he is too young; but I should say it was about time for him to begin his education."

The woman gave a short, harsh laugh at this.

"Education?" she repeated, scornfully. "Precious little education he will ever get, I'm thinking."

"But surely you would like him to go to school and learn like other children?" Audrey asked, gently.

"I've never thought much about it," was the indifferent reply.

"Is the child a relative of yours? He told me you were not his mother."

"No, he's neither kith nor kin of mine. He's a young one who fell to my care, and because I didn't dare do anything else, I've fed and housed him," Margaret Fox replied, unfeelingly.

"And have you no affection for the child?" Audrey asked, flushing with feeling. "He is a dear little fellow, and it is a pity that he should not be surrounded by love and kindness."

"My experience has taught me that precious little of either of these elements exist in this world," the woman retorted, bitterly.

"I am afraid you must have led a very hard life to make you feel like that," Audrey returned, "Would you be willing to let me do something for Rich?"

"What do you want to do for him?" was the curt query.

"I should like to send him to a nice little private school. I will clothe him properly and provide him with books. I will also, if you like, procure some employment for you, and thus help you to make your life more comfortable and agreeable."

A queer change passed over the face of Margaret Fox as Audrey said this. She grew suddenly crimson, her dark eyes blazed savagely for a moment, and her lips twitched nervously. Then she became cold and calm again, and, after a moment of awkward silence, responded:

"I want nobody's help; Madge Fox is able to take care of herself. As for the boy, I'll think about your offer and let you know."

"Thank you," Audrey said, courteously. It will give me employment and an object in life, if you allow me to provide for Rich's education. By the way, what is the rest of his name?"

"Richmond Fox," was the laconic response.

Audrey regarded her inquiringly.

"But you told me he was not a relative of yours," she said. "Won't you tell me something of the little fellow's history?"

"No; I will tell you nothing. If I accept your offer, you will have to be content to bestow your charity upon him as simple Richmond Fox. If your aim is merely to do good and to surround an unfortunate child with the influence of your 'love' and 'kindness,' it need not matter to you what his name is, nor what his antecedents are."

"Well," Audrey said, with a sigh, "I cannot of course compel you to tell me anything about him; but indeed I have become strangely interested in the boy, and I really desire to befriend him; and," she added, with great kindness, "if you need anything for yourself at any time, I hope you will make it known to me. Good morning."

"Good day," curtly replied Margaret Fox, as she followed her visitor to the door of her poverty-stricken cottage, and watched her drive away.

"Blue blood!" she muttered, almost fiercely, as she turned and went back into the house.

She threw herself into a chair, where she remained sitting in deep thought for a long time.

"I wonder if I dare do it?" she said, at last; and her face was very pale, a wild look in her eyes. "Why not? She is rich; she would never feel it, and—it will end that business forever!"

* * * * * *

The next morning Audrey Waldemar was sitting upon a side veranda of the house, when, all at once, a slight sound attracted her attention and turning toward it, she found little Richmond Fox standing beside her.

"Why, Rich! how did you manage to get here so quietly?" she asked, holding out her hand to him.

"Madge sent me."

"Madge sent you, did she?" Audrey repeated, "Does Madge wish anything particularly?" she added, after a moment.

"She told me to give you this," and he produced a letter and laid it upon Audrey's lap.

The letter was brief, but fairly worded and fairly written.

"MISS WALDEMAR," it began, "I send you the boy this morning—you may have him and welcome. He is nothing but a burden to me, and when you read this, I shall have left the place and the child in your hands, to do with as you may see fit. This much I will tell you of his history. He is of honorable parentage, and of good blood—that he shows in his make-up. His name is not 'Fox'; the 'Richmond' belongs to him, and you can call him whatever else you like. This is all that I shall tell you, and you can make the most of it. Perhaps your heart is so large, and so full of the 'milk of human kindness,' that you may be prompted to adopt him, and surround him with that 'love and care' of which you discoursed so sweetly yesterday, but of which, as a general principle, I know nothing, and have no faith in.

MARGARET FOX."

"What a queer letter! What a strange creature!" murmured Audrey.

"Rich!" she said, softly, and the child's black eyes were fixed upon her lovely face with an almost adoring expression. "Come here, Rich," she added.

He instantly arose and went to her side.

"Rich, how would you like it if Madge should give you to me?" Audrey asked, reading his face earnestly.

"To be your little boy always?" he cried, eagerly.

"Yes, for always."

"Would she?—would she do it? he asked, breathlessly.

"Yes; she says in this letter that I may have you."

"And you will never, never let her have me back again?—I may stay with you all the time?—live here?—see you every day?"

"Yes, dear, you are to be my little boy," Audrey answered. "I will never give you back to Madge, and you are to stay with me always, if you are good, until you grow to be a man and wish to go away from me. Madge has gone away," she continued, "she will never come back to the cottage any more. She says your name is not Richmond Fox, but something else, which she will not tell me. So I am going to name you Richmond Waldemar, and you are to call me auntie, or Aunt Audrey, whichever you please. How will such an arrangement suit you?" and Miss Waldemar held out her hand invitingly to her small protege.

The child seized her delicate hand in both of his plump brown ones, and threw himself upon his knees beside her, burying his curly head among the folds of her dress, while the hot tears rained over his face.

Audrey drew him gently to her, an increasing tenderness for him filling her heart—a sort of mother-love, as it were, thrilling her.

CHAPTER III.

A GLANCE BACKWARD.

In order to make our story complete, we must turn our glance backward and scan the history of a few years previous to its opening.

Audrey Waldemar was the youngest of five children. Four noble boys had been given to the Hon. Dudley Waldemar, but one after another had drooped and died in early life, thus blighting the hopes of the fond parents.

Their home had been desolate indeed until there had come to them a fair, blue-eyed little daughter.

Audrey was an exquisite little piece of humanity from her earliest infancy. She was like a flower in beauty and in fragrance, too—the fragrance of a sweet and lovely spirit—while in intelligence and precocious wisdom she was a marvel.

Every luxury and advantage which a full purse and a lavish hand could supply was showered upon her from the beginning.

At seventeen, having completed a thorough course of study, and her health suffering somewhat in consequence of persistent application, Mr. Waldemar's family physician prescribed change of scene and a year of travel.

To the fond parents, everything was of minor importance compared to the welfare of their beloved child, for their hearts were trembling with fear lest she, too, after all these years of watchful love, should slip from their grasp and vanish from their sight.

Mr. Waldemar committed his fine estate to the care of a faithful steward, closed his elegant residence, excepting that portion of it devoted to the couple of servants who were to keep it in order, and then, with his wife and daughter, repaired to New York, whence, after two or three weeks spent in sightseeing, they were to depart for the Pacific coast.

Mr. Waldemar had many friends in the great metropolis. The earlier years of his life had been spent there, and he had been a great favorite in fashionable society; therefore, as soon as it became known that he was stopping for a season in the city, he was besieged with invitations and attentions from various quarters, and for a month they were kept whirling in the very vortex, as it were, of fashionable life.

QUITE appropriate to the month is the photograph below of Marshall Fairbanks McIntire though it seems that his name should be Peter, Peter." Now that we know what a comfortable place a pumpkin can be we can think more kindly of the original Peter we knew in childhood days who put his wife in a pumpkin shell.

So many photographs have been received, over two hundred so far, that some of them will have to be returned but as many as there is space for will be used.—Ed.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Here I come to pay you another visit and bringing with me a picture of our other little boy. His name is Marshall Fairbanks McIntire and he is four months old and a brother to the boy whose picture appeared in the July 1919 COMFORT. The pumpkin he is sitting in weighed fifty-nine pounds. We raised a lot of nice pumpkins last year. My husband brought six from the field that weighed from forty-seven and one half pounds to sixty and one half pounds. They are fine pumpkins.

I wonder if any of the sisters know a song entitled "The Black Sheep." I would like so much to have a copy of it.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I come in answer to Mrs. W's call for letters telling how to make our homes more attractive. I moved into a new home last spring and, as usual, nothing "fit." My dining-room was a dark, dreary room with a very rough floor that had been smoothed at the sides and painted as a border for a rug. But I had no rug and no cash with which to buy one and to make matters worse my furniture was scratched and marred and some of the chairs, which had veneered seats, had holes through them. So I set my wits to work. First I removed the veneer from the chair seats and sandpapered the foundation until smooth. Gave all the furniture a coat of stained varnish. Then I took a number of burlap sacks which I washed and dyed a dark blue. These I cut perfectly straight and sewed part of them together for a rug. I padded the floor heavily with paper and then tacked my rug down. I tacked light boards on the chair seats and padded them with excelsior and scraps of cotton batting and covered this with the burlap. I also made a scarf from the burlap for the china cupboard, ravelling a two-inch fringe at the ends. My white curtains were good but too short so I made them into sash curtains. When this was done and the table covered with a clean white table cloth (made from four 100 pounds sugar sacks) and with a bowl of roses in the center, no one would ask for a prettier room in which to eat his pork and beans. And all this for the sum of $1.35.

I am now planning to use more burlap sacks, dyed dark green, to cover my living-room chairs and couch. I am making a hammock of sacks, dyed, using barrel staves padded with cotton and excelsior in the ends.

Can any of the sisters tell me how to make the so-called "monkey" which hotel cooks use in making brown gravy? The only ingredient of which I am certain is burnt sugar. If I am asked to call again I will tell you of some of the inexpensive gifts which I make for Christmas and birthdays. I almost forgot another request I wished to make. Can any of the sisters tell me if it is possible to make tuti-fruti without the use of brandy?

Love to all. HOME MAKER.

Home Maker.—Yours is a most interesting letter and I can almost picture you in your delightful little home. How proud you must be of it and your husband must be even more proud of his clever wife. Yes indeed, do tell us about the Christmas gifts you make. Judging from the originality you have already shown they will be worth while. The recipe for coloring soups is given in regular recipe column.—Ed.

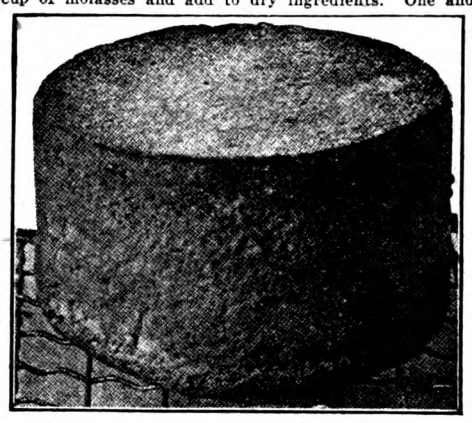
DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:



As I am confined to my bed for a while I have read and read all the latest COMFORTS and thought I'd write and tell you that I think our paper was rightly named. I got much good out of each paper. The short stories are particularly fine and I can't tell you how much I enjoy the Sisters' Corner, also the Talks With Girls. I often tell my daughter that a girl could not go wrong by taking the advice given in that column. I have two children, a boy of eleven and a daughter of

Comfort Sisters' Recipes

HOME MAKER, from Iowa, tells us how she made her dining-room a thing of beauty and a joy forever, as well as a delightful place in which to eat her daily bread—and "pork and beans," and below is given a recipe for brown bread, real New England brown bread. Not only is a recipe given but an illustration as well, showing exactly how it should look as to shape and size, but the color and frangrance cannot be shown. That you will have to find out for yourselves.—Ed.

BOSTON BROWN BREAD.—Sift together one cup of rye meal, one cup of corn meal, one cup of Graham flour, one teaspoon of salt, and two and one half teaspoons of soda. Stir into two cups of sour milk three-fourths cup of molasses and add to dry ingredients. One and three fourths cup of sweet milk may be used, but the sour is better. Beat thoroughly to make the bread fine grained. Put mixture into tightly covered mould or pail and steam four hours. Remove cover and bake half an hour in hot oven.

SOUP STOCK.—A piece of lean beef cut small, the bones broken; add any scraps of cooked or uncooked meat. Allow a quart of cold water to a pound of meat. Set in a cool place an hour, or until the juices of the meat color the water. Heat slowly; when it boils gently, keep it where it will just simmer, five or six hours; stir often and skim carefully. Strain the liquid and set it in a cool place. Next day take the cake of fat from the top, strain it again. Stock prepared in this way may be used for any kind of soup, gravies or hash.

CARAMEL FOR SOUP OR GRAVIES.—Heat one cup of granulated sugar in an iron pan, stir it until a dark brown; add slowly one cup of cold water; let it boil until a little thick. When cool it should be as thick as molasses. Put it in a wide-mouthed bottle. It will keep a long time. A teaspoonful will give a rich color to soup.

BROWN SOUP.—Two quarts of stock, two small turnips, two carrots; season with salt, pepper, Cayenne, and a blade of mace. Boil gently half an hour, then skim out the vegetables; keep them hot to serve with the soup. Add dumplings and cook twelve minutes. Add one teaspoon of caramel just before serving, to give it a rich color.

HALIBUT AU GRATIN.—One pound boiled halibut, one pint white sauce; with one half teaspoon onion juice stirred into it. Pull fish apart lightly with a fork, and season with salt and pepper. Put a tablespoon of sauce into each scallop shell, then a layer of fish, and another of sauce; sprinkle bread crumbs on top and pour over one teaspoon of melted butter. Bake a light brown. This quantity is sufficient for six shells.

WHITE SAUCE.—One tablespoon butter, one tablespoon flour, one half teaspoon salt, one cup milk, one quarter teaspoon pepper. Put the butter in a saucepan, when boiling stir in flour, salt and pepper; then add slowly the milk which should be just scalded; lastly the onion juice.

FISH BALLS.—Take dry cod fish, put to soak in cold water; when it is well soaked bring to a scald, but not boil it. Have good mealy potatoes cooked. Take two thirds potatoes and one third fish chopped fine. Then add a small piece of butter, a little pepper and salt if it is required; two eggs and enough cream or milk to mould easily. Roll the cakes in flour, and fry in boiling pork fat.

WHITE FRICASSEE OF CHICKEN.—Free a cooked fowl of skin, bones and fat, and cut it into small pieces. Season with salt and pepper. Put three tablespoons of butter into the frying pan, and when it becomes hot, add two tablespoons of flour. Stir until smooth and frothy, then gradually add a pint of the water in which the fowl was boiled, and season with salt and pepper. When the gravy boils up, add the cut meat and simmer for ten minutes; then add half a cup of cream or milk, and allow the fricassee to boil up once. Serve on a hot dish, with a garnish of toast.

CHICKEN PIE.—Two chickens boiled tender in just enough water to cover them; when done, line a deep dish with rich pastry, then lay the chickens in, alternating the white and dark meat. When full, slice three hard-boiled eggs and lay over the top, and quite a quantity of butter cut fine, then turn over all the juice of the chickens and some rich stock thickened, and flavor to suit the taste. Cover with rich pastry and bake two hours.

BAKED EGGS.—Rub small cups with butter, and break one egg in each cup. Then pour on one tablespoon of milk, and season with salt, pepper and a small bit of butter. Set cups in hot water and bake in oven until done to suit. Serve in the cups.

RELISH.—Boil eggs very hard; cut lengthwise, then take yolks (without breaking the whites) and pass them through a sieve with as much grated ham and butter, a little pepper, and mustard, if one wishes, mix well together, and refill the eggs, then put them in the oven until browned. Serve hot on toast.

APPLES WITH MARSHMALLOW.—Wash and wipe four large apples. Remove the core and press into cavity two marshmallows cut into pieces that will pack closely. Place apples in a deep agate pan and pour over them a sauce made by boiling together one half cup of sugar, one quarter of a cup of corn syrup, one third of a teaspoon of vanilla, and one third cup of chopped raisins. Bake in a moderately hot oven until soft all the way through. Remove from oven, top each apple with one whole marshmallow and return to oven until marshmallows are lightly browned.

CORN CAKE (THIN).—One cup of yellow corn meal, one quarter cup of sugar, one half teaspoon of salt, one cup of flour, two teaspoons of baking powder, one egg, one cup of sweet milk, one tablespoon of melted butter.

JOHNNY CAKE.—One cup of granulated corn meal, two cups of flour, two thirds of a cup of brown sugar, one egg, two teaspoons of cream tartar, one teaspoon of soda, four tablespoons of melted shortening, a little salt and cold water to make a thin batter.

SOUR MILK BISCUIT.—Take one quart sifted flour, sift one and one half teaspoons soda, one and one half teaspoons cream tartar and salt through the flour. Butter or lard the size of an egg. Stir in enough sour milk to knead; bake in a hot oven.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

The first scene of this story is laid in a prairie village where a circus is given. Para, an expert animal trainer, is selling patent medicines from his wagon, and assisted by Rudolph, a handsome boy thirteen years old. Beneath the wagon is Nemo, a coyote. A terrible cyclone comes suddenly, tents are torn from their fastenings, cages overturned and animals too frightened to escape. The storm ceases. Rudolph, calling Para, they go to the wagon where, beneath it, they find a golden-haired girl, three years old, soundly sleeping. She is the gift of the storm from a wrecked train, and Rudolph begs Para to keep her. Fifteen years later and the circus is still in existence. Nemo, an old wolf now and still loving Rudolph but devoted to Dorothy, who traveling with them, but never permitted to enter the ring, leads a care-free life, living for herself and the three dear to her, Para, Rudolph and the coyote. Rudolph appears in a new suit of spangles, and while Dorothy is complimenting him, Philip Hastings enters dressed in tinsel, and her approval of his suit repays him for the expense, and with a new light in his eyes he asks Dorothy to be his wife. Refusing him, he forces her face toward him and kisses her. Striking him, she causes the blood to flow and she knows she has made him her enemy for life. The performance begins and the audience wait for Para in the lion's cage. The animals are less manageable and he sends the horse around the ring and motions for the lioness; she makes one round and refuses the second. With a cut from Para's whip, the lioness springs, burying her claws in his neck. A blow from Rudolph and she is dead beside her victim. Rudolph and Dorothy leave the circus. Dorothy wants a little home where they can be happy together. It cannot be unless she becomes his wife, which to her would be like marrying a brother, and to shield Dorothy he leaves her.

CHAPTER IV.

A COMPANION FOR DOROTHY.

IT was something like three weeks later when Rudolph succeeded in finding a companion for Dorothy, and, incidentally, the house in the country for which she had so longed.

He found a quaint little woman, speaking English with a decidedly French accent, ladylike in appearance and deportment, and with a manner which attracted him strangely. She was rather older than he would have chosen, her hair being white as snow, but one can't pause for defects like that. And, after all, age lent greater respectability. She explained to him her desire for the position by saying:

"For nearly twenty years I was the companion of a lady who was more my friend than my employer. I don't think it ever occurred to either of us that she would die and leave me quite alone in the world at my time of life, with a living to get. We led a very quiet and retired life in a very beautiful place, known as the Peak Castle. She was wealthy, and I had been accustomed to share her competence with her, so that it never dawned upon either of us that there would come a time when I should be in the depths of poverty. But so it is. She neglected to make her will, and, in consequence, the property goes to the next of kin, a male heir, whom I have never seen, and whom she had not seen since his early boyhood. We had lived so exclusively in our books, and for each other, that we had few friends, neither of us caring for society, so there was no one to whom I could go. I should be very glad of the companionship of a young and lovely girl."

"She is very lovely," Rudolph said quietly, "and the life you describe is one she longs for. She has never known anything of society, either, and wishes now to settle in some quiet nook, where she can have the advantages of country life. I have been looking about for a place for her, though I have not found it yet. We are not wealthy, and cannot afford a very extravagant home. It is more a nest that I desire to secure for her than a residence."

"I know of such a lovely one—not expensive, but for sale at a real bargain, quite close to Peak Castle. It is a cottage, vine-clad and ideal, surrounded by the most exquisite little rose-garden—a miniature Garden of Eden. She would revel in it, I know."

"I will go and see it if you will give me the address."

"And I should be very glad to accompany you, if I can be of any service."

It was arranged that they should make a little pilgrimage together—Rudolph, Dorothy and Madam Delpre—the two latter having taken a decided liking to each other.

They found the cottage exactly as madam had represented it—a veritable Garden of Eden in miniature, with a price not above what Para had made it possible for them to pay, so that the purchase was recorded in Dorothy's name, and the furniture selected with a care that gave Dorothy occupation for several weeks.

And during that time Rudolph thought not of himself at all. As they sat together upon that last evening she slipped her hand in his and lifted her great, saddened eyes to his face.

"I feel, somehow, as if I were losing you as I lost Para, Rudolph," she said, her lips trembling. "You won't forget me, will you?"

"Forget you, Dorothy!" he repeated, his voice choked with emotion. "Good God, child! If you knew how much a part of me you are, you would not need to ask that! Don't speak like that, little one!"

He had said so much more than he meant to that he was startled at himself, and, rising suddenly, he went to the window and looked out.

Dorothy looked at him earnestly, seeing only his back. How handsome he was!

She went up to him and slipped her hand through his arm, looking up into the beautiful face, with its great, dark eyes, still singularly like they had been in boyhood.

"I shall miss you so, Rudolph," she said softly, pressing her curly head against his shoulder. "It will be our first separation. If—if I—couldn't bear it, and—and should telegraph for you to come—would you do it?"

He looked down at her quickly, half-incredulously. The swift color had rushed to his sun-tanned cheeks. It receded slowly.

"You will not miss me like that, Dorothy," he said, forcing himself to speak quietly.

"But if I should?" she persisted. "If I should?"

"If you should need me, or want me, I would come from the ends of the earth," he answered passionately. "You have only to send one little word, only one, Dorothy, and not death itself could keep me from you. But you will not miss me like that."

"I don't know, Rudolph," she stammered. "I was never so—so unhappy in my life as I am tonight, and it is all because you are going tomorrow. I almost wish tomorrow would never come for either of us. And you will want to see me, also, just a little, won't you?"

"I shall want to see you every moment of my life, and I shall see the face in my heart, little one. But you must not think of this parting as if it were forever. Remember, I shall come every month."

She sighed.

"A month may not be long to you, but it is thirty whole days to me—thirty long, endless days, and I never went an hour in my life without seeing you. You don't love me as I thought you did, Rudolph."

She turned away and left him, a sigh in her throat, and he let her go. Let her go because he dared not detain her, lest he speak the wild, passionate words that were trembling upon his lips, lest he beseech her to let him remain forever. But he knew that she would refuse, and he should accomplish nothing beyond destroying her beautiful confidence in him, her sweet and loving trust. He knew that he would only give her pain, and she had far better suffer this little sorrow.

He didn't believe that it would be so great as she anticipated, but he was very white as he offered his hand to Madam Delpre at parting.

"I am trusting you with more than my life!" he said to her chokingly. "Take care of my little treasure. Remember, she is all I have in the world!"

He looked back as he reached a turn in the road, and saw her lying upon the grass, with her face buried in Nemo's back, sobbing as if her heart would break, and he, unselfish as usual, would have comforted her if he could even for his absence.

Madam Delpre looked at her intently as she came into the pretty drawing-room half-an-hour later.

"You have cried until your pretty eyes are quite spoiled," she said gently. "Your Rudolph would never forgive me for that. How he loves you, cherie."

"Yes," answered Dorothy, her lip still quivering ominously. "We have only each other. I was his storm-gift, you know. Rudolph told you of it, didn't he?"

"Yes. It was very pretty and very romantic. He has left the circus now, hasn't he?"

"Yes. I couldn't bear it after Para's death."

"Oh, yes."

"Then, cherie, if I were you, I would let that chapter in my life be closed and hermetically sealed."

"Why?" queried Dorothy wonderingly.

"Of course, you were brought up with a circus, and don't know much of any other life, but—you won't mind if I speak quite plainly? You won't let me offend you? Remember, I speak only through interest and love of my new ward."

"I shall not be offended. Go on."

"Then, dear, the world calls the circus—low! Of course, there are in it noble men and women, as we find them in every walk of life, but by the world they are shunned. You are very beautiful, child, and very ladylike. No one would ever dream that you were not to the manner born, as you may be; who knows? In the years to come it would ruin your chances in life if it were known that you had ever been connected, even remotely, with a circus, or with circus people. The new people you are liable to meet have very likely never heard of Para or Rudolph, and would never meet any of those who have known you in the past. It would be the greatest possible advantage to you if you could induce Rudolph never to speak of it either to you or to any one."

"Rudolph would never speak of it if I requested him not to!" exclaimed Dorothy, her cheeks flaming as the shame of it all touched her for the first time.

"Then do so by all means. Do you know that I have never even heard your last name?"

"And I don't know it," answered Dorothy, the crimson deepening. "Para used to call me by Rudolph's name sometimes—Dorothy Griswold. He is Rudolph Griswold, you know. Para did it because he said I belonged to Rudolph."

"Then it is quite settled that the circus is to be a thing of the past, buried in Para's grave?"

"And it isn't like forgetting Para?"

"Dear child, no! Why do you suppose Para saved his money and willed it to you? Why, foreseeing this hour. It is as he would wish it, and as Rudolph would wish it when he understands. You see, while my patroness and I lived a very quiet and secluded life, there were necessarily a few friends made, and I was her friend, her associate, so that, in spite of my poverty, there will be those who will remember. I was connected with Peak Castle, and that is the grandest estate for hundreds of miles about here. People will not forget that. They will want to see my new charge, and they will call. There is no reason why you should not make a sensation in the world if you so desire it, child."

"I?"

"Yes. I have already told you you are beautiful. You are refined, and you possess a manner that a duchess might not be ashamed to own. It isn't necessary that you should speak of your past—there is no real disgrace in it, you understand, only if the world knew you would not be more shunned if you were afflicted with a plague. What shall you do, cherie?"

"There is—no—reason why the—the world should know," she faltered.

CHAPTER V.

THE BIRTH OF AMBITION.

Peak Castle was, as Madam Delpre had said, the show place of the community. It was a magnificent estate, the castle having been built originally by one of the early settlers who landed on those shores from the celebrated Mayflower. Not that it was a castle then, by any means. The original building, however, had been added to and surrounded; first by a long, low, rambling structure, with a beautiful quadrangle in its center, then gradually elevated until its turrets were to be seen for miles around. It was situated on the highest peak of the mountainous range adjacent, and from that had derived its name.

The park surrounding it was famed far and near for its broad acres, its magnificent trees, and its wonderful deer and antelope, which were as tame as dogs, eating from one's hand with a confidence not often possessed by wild animals.

Madam Delpre had taken Dorothy to see the superb old place until Dorothy knew it almost as well as madam herself, who had spent the best years of her life beneath the historic roof, but on their last visit they were notified that the new heir was expected. Madam sighed. It seemed to her that that new heir had wronged her in some way, though she could scarcely have told how, as he certainly had the best right to a property which had belonged to his family for generations.

"He is married, I suppose?" she questioned of the old butler, whom she had known for more years than he remembered.

"I think not, madam," he answered. "He has written me that he was coming, and to have a room prepared for him—any room I might select—and he could make his own choice after his arrival. He certainly said nothing of a wife, and he would most likely have mentioned at least a suite if a lady were to accompany him."

Madam Delpre said nothing. She glanced critically at the girl beside her, seeing a tall, stately young creature, graceful as one of the undulating saplings in the park beyond, her exquisite red-brown hair tossed slightly by the breeze, her complexion rivaling any perfect rose in the garden, her darkly fringed eyes brilliant with the health and joy of youth.

An expression of extreme satisfaction crossed madam's face. She had never seen any one so lovely as Dorothy Griswold, and madam was a connoisseur of beauty, in spite of the quiet and almost uneventful life she had led.

"Peak Castle is a grand old estate," she said to Dorothy, as they drove homeward in Dorothy's pretty, picturesque pony-carriage. "If Kenneth Cameron is not married, there will be a sensation among the marriageable girls in this vicinity. I shall hope to have you meet him, my dear."

"Why?" questioned Dorothy.

"Because," she answered quietly, "it is well that young girls should be thrown in the best society possible. Kenneth Cameron comes of one of the finest families in America. I know that he can be nothing but a gentleman. He has lived the greater part of his life abroad, receiving his education at some of the famous colleges of the world. I shall be very glad to see what the young man is like."

Dorothy gave no intimation of any curiosity upon the subject.

"The park is beautiful!" she said gravely. "Charming as the house is, I prefer the park. How I should love to own those perfect deer."

Madam smiled.

"Do you think they would become friendly with your Nemo?"

"If not, I should dislike them!"

And, apparently, she would dislike anything that came in contact with her pet, for her devotion to him was perfect.

In the evening she would sit upon the broad piazza, in a low chair, with Nemo at her feet, playing upon her guitar, her sweet voice making the very wild birds envious, while Madam Delpre sat beside her, thinking how charmingly life had changed for her, and how much more youth a young companion put into one's veins than an old one, no matter what the old associations had been.

And they were sitting like that one evening, enjoying the exquisite moon and the music, when a young man paused in the shadow of a tree.

He waited until the song was finished, until she had thrown her guitar aside and buried her lovely face in the long, shaggy hair of the wolf's back, and then he came forward.

Nemo received him with a low growl, but Dorothy lifted her face, and slapped him lightly, gently, where she had kissed him before.

"Silence, you inhospitable fellow!" she exclaimed. "You never growl unless there is a stranger on the premises. Now, where is he?"

"Here!" answered the young man, coming more fully from the shadow. "Will you pardon the intrusion, ladies? This is Madam Delpre, I am sure. I have taken this informal hour because it is the very first I have had, and because I felt that I should be more likely to find you alone, and I wanted so to apologize for all I have cost you. I am Kenneth Cameron, dear madam." She arose and held out her hand, smiling graciously, and looking at him with quick, critical eyes.

He was tall and fine of mould, almost as tall as Rudolph, and almost as well proportioned.

His face was classic in cut, the line of his mouth being exceptionally fine and unshaded by any hirsute appendage whatever.

His hair was blond, almost golden, and his eyes blue as those of a boy.

It was a frank, open, handsome face, and one that a person instinctively trusted.

"How kind of you to call upon me so soon!" Madam Delpre exclaimed. "I assure you I did not expect it. I am so glad. Will you permit me to present you to my young charge, Miss Griswold?"

The boyish eyes were turned with open admiration toward Dorothy, who held out her beautifully shaped hand to make him welcome.

"I should have been in America before if I had known how charming my new home was to be made by my neighbors," he exclaimed smilingly.

"Will you come into the drawing-room?" madam asked. "I will ring for lights."

"Please don't, if I may have my choice!" exclaimed Cameron. "May I sit down here? I feel quite like a friend of the family in this informality. I came purposely to persuade you to return to Peak Castle. You loved it and I did not! I heard of you and of all that you had lost by my inheritance at the same time that I heard of the inheritance. Of course, there was a little natural curiosity to see it, and so I came, hoping that I might persuade you to return and live there just as you had for so many years, and I find you with a home of your own infinitely more attractive. I asked Hopkins about you and he told me how I should find you. The night is so magnificent that I walked over."

"How very kind of you, Mr. Cameron," exclaimed Madam Delpre. "I can't tell you how I appreciate it. I am very happy here with my new charge, and as the estate does not really need me any longer, I should feel more comfortable earning my living in some way, though Heaven knows it is the pleasantest and easiest way that ever a living was earned. Am I to understand that you are going back at once, then, as soon as you have become acquainted with your estate?"

"That was my intention," he answered, with a glance at Dorothy and an emphasis upon the verb. "Now, however, I think I will remain and learn something of my native country. I have not been in America since I was a boy of ten."

"Really? Then you have many pleasures in anticipation. You have some charming neighbors."

"I am quite aware of it, though I arrived by the four-o'clock train this afternoon. I can imagine the castle could be made a very delightful place if only there were a woman to brighten it and make it habitable. It is deadly lonely now. Are there many young people in the vicinity, madam?"

"Yes. It is a neighborhood of wonderfully good families—extremely select—and you will be repaid for a stay among them."

"I thought of giving some sort of entertainment at the castle, that is, if you will assist me—you and Miss Griswold. The labor of it would not bother you at all, if you would not consider making out the invitation-list for me a nuisance. Will you, madam?"

"Why, with all the pleasure you could imagine! I am sure it would be the greatest delight to us both. Miss Griswold is an orphan, without relatives entirely, save one young man who is almost a brother to her. He is not here, however, and it is lonely for her, very."

"Then, perhaps, you would let me come and take you to ride sometimes!" exclaimed young Cameron eagerly. "You ride, do you not?"

Dorothy remembered the circus and colored.

Suppose he knew that? Would he be so anxious for her society?

"Yes," she answered softly, "I ride."

"Better than any one I have ever seen," supplemented madam serenely. "I don't think there is a fence in the neighborhood that her hunter has not taken."

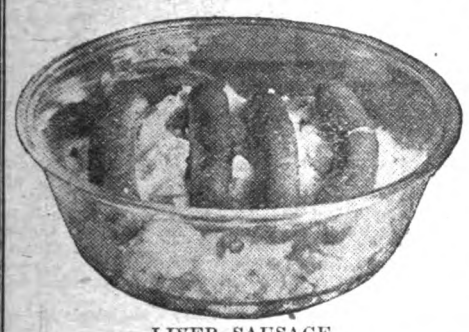
"How delightful!" exclaimed Cameron. "I feel that I am an old acquaintance of Madam Delpre's, Miss Griswold, and therefore can presume further than most fellows who have known you but a single day. Won't you let me come tomorrow morning, and won't you show me the country? Remember that I also am a stranger."

"I should be very glad to go," answered Dorothy simply.

"Thank you so much!" murmured the young man, with infinite satisfaction. "And now the concession emboldens me. Won't you sing again? I never heard a voice so fresh and pure and true as yours. I can't tell you how beautiful it sounded as I stood among the shadows. You will forgive me for playing eavesdropper, will you not?"

Dorothy only smiled and took up her guitar.

And then her sweet, rich voice rolled out, the notes of the guitar blending under her practiced hand, until the soul of Kenneth Cameron was enslaved.



CHAPTER VI.

A PROPOSAL.

Madam Delpre was not slow to recognize the impression which Dorothy had made. She sat very silent for a time, even after Cameron had

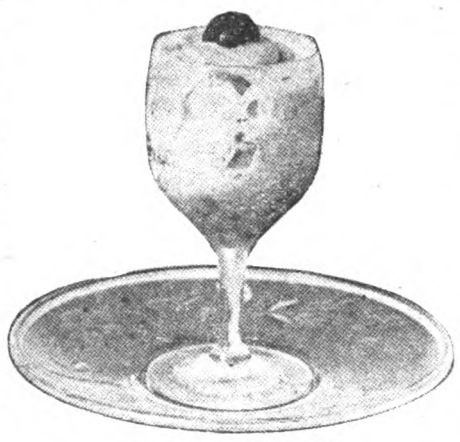
FALL CANNING AND COOKING

LIVER SAUSAGE

CANNING MEATS, APPLE SYRUP, FRUIT BUTTERS, OTHER RECIPES

By Violet Marsh

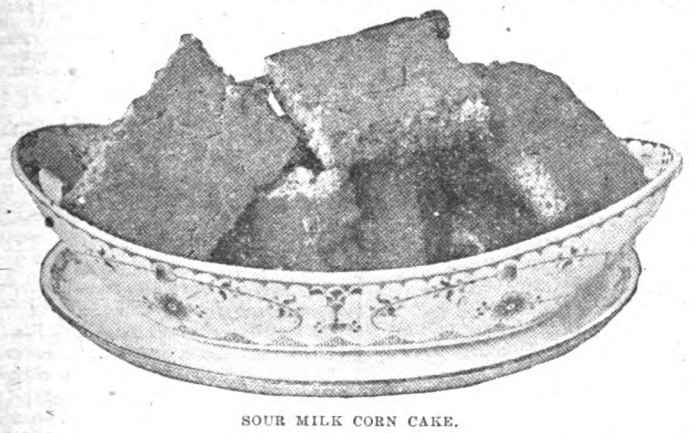
IT is not necessary to partially cook meat before canning; in fact, it is better not to, for thereby much flavor is lost. Meats may be canned instead of corning or smoking, or corned meat may be canned. With grain so high, many will can their chickens and fowl reserved for family use instead of feeding them through the winter.



Be sure that meats for canning are in perfect condition. Remove all parts that are not edible, such as bone, gristle and fat. Cut into pieces to fit the can, sear in fat, or scald in boiling water and pack at once. Fill jars to overflowing with boiling water or meat liquor, add an even teaspoon of salt to each quart jar of meat. In canning tough meats, or old fowls, it is well to boil them half an hour before canning.

Too high a temperature injures the flavor, destroys the texture, and shrinks meat, and for this reason the hot water bath for meats is preferable to a steam outfit.

Raw beef, poultry or pork should be cooked in the jar four hours. If half cooked before putting into the cans, two hours is required.

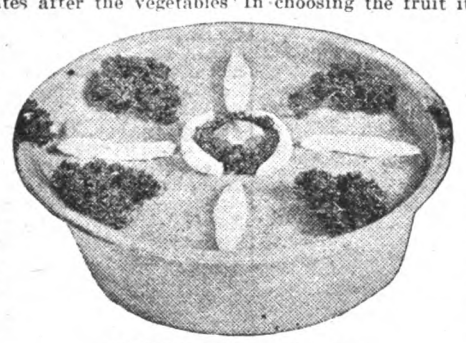


Bones from which the meat has been cut for canning should be cracked with a cleaver, and all odd pieces of meat added that could not be canned. Cover with cold water, bring near the boiling point and then simmer until the meat falls from the bones. Strain, season and can as soup stock, or add vegetables, rice or macaroni and cook in jars three hours.

Sausage meat can be made into small cakes lightly fried in rather deep fat, placed in jars and cooked.

COFFEE BLANC-MANGE.

CANNED LIVER SAUSAGE MEAT.—Use hog, beef or veal liver. Clean in plenty cold water removing the membranes and large blood vessels. Let stand in cold water two hours. Cover with boiling water and bring quickly to boil. Skin, set on back of stove and slowly cook until done. Put through meat chopper, using the fine cutter. By weight use half as much fat pork as liver; boil and chop, using the coarse cutter. Mix liver and pork thoroughly. To three pounds of liver and one and a half pounds of pork, add five teaspoons of salt, one scant teaspoon of cloves, one medium-sized onion chopped fine, one level teaspoon of pepper, and half a teaspoon of thyme. Mix until the spice and onion is well incorporated. Fill jars, adjust rubbers and half seal. Set into boiler with water to shoulder of jar. Boil hard three hours. Remove from boiler and complete seal. If sausage casings can be procured the meat is stuffed into them before canning, and after being put into the jars they are filled to overflowing with the water in which the livers were boiled. Liver sausage meat on buttered mashed potato put into the oven until the potato is well puffed, is a tasty combination.



SOUR MILK CORN CAKE.

Other Tested Recipes

GOULASH.—Chop two onions very fine and fry in two tablespoons of beef fat until they are a very pale brown, stirring continually. Add two pounds of beef cut into two-inch cubes, stirring so that it will boil, and sear a few minutes. Now add one cup of boiling water, one cup of tomato, one chopped green pepper, one stalk of celery cut fine, one chopped carrot, one and one-half teaspoons of salt, and two teaspoons of sweet paprika. Cook slowly for two hours, adding a little water as it boils away. If goulash is to be canned, cook fifteen minutes after the vegetables are added, and then two and one-half hours in the can.

CALF'S HEAD—Take out the brains and tongue and cover with cold water. Scrape and wash the head, removing all the dark membrane from the inside, and the gristle around the eyes and nose. Soak one and a half hours in tepid water. Put the tongue, heart and head on to boil in cold water and skim several times. Tie in a piece of cloth a few sage leaves, two bay leaves and a few summer savory, thyme and marjoram leaves and cook with the head; also add one-quarter of a teaspoon of pepper and one level tablespoon of salt. Wash the liver in cold water, then cover with boiling water and let it stand fifteen minutes, putting it into the kettle when the head is nearly done. When done, remove the pieces of meat from the head, and with the tongue, heart and liver place in a shallow baking dish, cover well with buttered bread-crumbs and brown in the oven. Serve with brain sauce.

CHICKEN WITH MACARONI.

BRAIN SAUCE.—Wash, remove the red membrane and soak in cold water. Boil fifteen minutes in water enough to cover, adding one tablespoon of vinegar and a little salt. Drain, cover with cold water and drain again. Chop fine and add to one pint of white sauce.

CHICKEN WITH MACARONI.—Break into small pieces one-half pound of macaroni and drop into boiling salted water. Cook until soft, keeping the water boiling hard. Pour into strainer and then plunge strainer into a pan of cold water to prevent the macaroni becoming sticky. Mix with two cups of boned and chopped chicken meat, add about four tablespoons of grated cheese, four tablespoons of cream or chicken liquor, two well-beaten eggs, a scant half teaspoon of salt and a little cayenne pepper. Stir the mixture thoroughly and pour into baking dish. Cover closely and set into a pan of water and bake one and a half hours. Serve with tomato sauce.

MINCEMEAT.—Clean beef hearts thoroughly in cold water, removing the membranes and any clots from the arteries and veins. Boil slowly until tender and put through the meat chopper. To one quart of meat add three quarts of chopped tart apples, four cups of brown sugar, three cups of white sugar, two cups of molasses, seven cups of seeded raisins, five cups of washed currants, the liquor from the beef heart, which should measure about one quart; eight even teaspoons of cinnamon, two even teaspoons of cloves, one pint of strong apple vinegar, and four even teaspoons of salt Cook slowly seven hours, stirring frequently. If kept in a cold, dry place in a covered stone crock, this mincemeat need not be sealed.

SPICE CAKES.—Beat one egg well and then beat into it two-thirds cup of molasses and two-thirds cup of sugar. Add two-thirds cup of warmed shortening and one cup of milk. Measure two and one-half cups of sifted flour and sift again with one rounding teaspoon of soda, one level teaspoon of cream of tartar, one teaspoon of cinnamon, one-third of a teaspoon of nutmeg, one-third of a teaspoon of mace, and a pinch each of cloves and allspice. Stir flour into first mixture, and, lastly, thoroughly stir in one tablespoon of vinegar. Bake in a moderate oven until the cakes are brown and slightly shrink from tins. Add one cup of seedless raisins if desired.

COFFEE BLANC-MANGE.—Mix together one even half cup of corn-starch, one half cup of granulated sugar, one quarter of a teaspoon of salt, and wet it with one cup of cold strong coffee. Stir slowly into three cups of scalding hot milk in a double boiler, stirring constantly. Cook twenty minutes after it thickens, stirring occasionally. Remove from fire and beat in one teaspoon of vanilla and the white of one egg first beaten until stiff and dry. The heat of mixture will cook the egg and make the blanc-mange fluffy. When cold, fill glasses, and top with a little whipped cream and a spoonful of sweet jelly, or it may be poured into a wet mould and served on plates.

Home-Made Grape Juice
Apple Syrup and Fruit Butters

Unfermented grape juice is exceptionally valuable for appealing to the sick, and is a wholesome, appetizing beverage for young and old alike.

The cold-press method is more easily managed at home, and local grapes should be used that they may be pressed while fresh from the vines. In choosing the fruit it is important to use that which has fully ripened and developed its maximum sugar content, flavor and color, but which has not begun to dry up or decay. The grapes must be clean and sound.

Best results are obtained if grapes are picked from stems before crushing. In crushing, aim only to burst and mash the pulp, for if the seeds are crushed the juice will be hard, astringent, and difficult to filter. What is known as the "free-run" juice is the best.

If a fruit press is unobtainable, the grapes may be pressed with a potato masher, or put into a strong muslin bag and squeezed by hand. Clarification should start as soon as the pressing is finished and is accomplished by letting the juice stand undisturbed over night. In the morning drain off the juice so as to leave all sediment in the bottom, and strain it through a double cheesecloth. Make a second straining through flannel first wrung out of warm water.

Have jars or bottles thoroughly sterilized and fill at once with the strained juice. Sterilize one hour after the water begins to boil, following

Cubby Bear Visits Busy Beaver

By Lena B. Ellingwood

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

"I HAVE something sad to tell you, Cubby Bear," said Busy Beaver one morning; "Brother Binney Beaver and I must leave our home, where we have been so happy, and go somewhere else to live."

"Oh, I am sorry for that," said Cubby. "But why must you go?"

"As you know," answered Busy Beaver, "we must have poplar trees, and we have used up all that were growing near. We use the poplar logs, the small branches, and even the twigs, to build and keep in order our dams and lodges, and we gnaw the bark from them for food. So we must move, but I hope we shall not have to go far away from this neighborhood."

"I hope not," said Cubby, "for I like you, Busy Beaver, and should miss you and Brother Binney if you went where I could not see you."

"I came to ask you to go with us this morning to look for a new place to build," said Busy Beaver. "We shall follow the Big Brook, and look for a poplar grove, for we do not want to move to another stream."

Cubby was delighted to go exploring with the beavers, and ran into the house to tell Mamma Bruin about it. Then he and Busy Beaver went to the beavers' home, where Brother Binney was waiting. Together the three started down stream, one beaver going on each side of the brook, and Cubby Bear, sometimes with one, sometimes with the other or wading in the water where the bottom of the brook was not too rough.

They had gone about a mile when Busy Beaver called to the others, "Come here! See what you think of this!"

"Look," he said, when they drew near; "I have found a beautiful little grove of poplars here. See how prettily their leaves flutter! There is only one trouble with this place that I can see."

"It is farther from the Big Brook than I would like," objected Brother Binney Beaver.

"Yes," agreed Busy Beaver, "that is the trouble—we will have to dig a long canal to float our sticks to the Big Brook, but we do not want to go further from the friends in our old neighborhood than we can help."

"Oh, let me help you in digging the canal," offered Cubby Bear. "I love to dig."

The course of the canal was carefully laid out by the two beavers, who threw off their hats and went to work with a will.

Cubby worked, too, digging where his friends told him, and had a beautiful holiday. By night a great deal had been accomplished, and they went back home together, well satisfied with the day's work.

"I am glad you started today, so I could go with you," Cubby told them, "for tomorrow I have to go to Mr. Wise Owl's school again."

At school Cubby Bear told his friends about the moving of the beavers, and how he had helped them to start their canal.

"We will all go to visit them some day," Wise Owl promised his pupils, "and your lessons for that day shall be about logging operations, canals and other water courses, and the scientific construction of dams and aquatic lodges. Yes, yes! when the beavers have had time to get their work well under way, we will spend a day with them."

"I wish Mr. Wise Owl would talk so we could understand him," complained Slimy Snail to Tillie Turtle, privately, "and not use such big words."

"Why, bless you, child," said Tillie, "haven't you seen the beavers' old place, time and again? They won't have anything different, and Wise Owl just means that we'll see how they make their dams and lodges and canals, and gnaw down their trees. It will be nothing new to us, but we shall have a good time, so I mean to go with the others."

It was planned that they should all meet at the old sugar-house where the school was held, on a morning some time later, and with Mr. Wise Owl as leader, march to the beavers' new home. When the day came, Wise Owl called the roll, and everyone answered "Present," excepting Wollie Woodchuck, Tillie Turtle and Slimy Snail.

Wise Owl rumpled his feathers in a vexed way.

"I do not like this," he said. "I expressly told the whole school to be present."

"I can tell you where they are," chirped little Chickadee Chirrupee, who was hanging, head downward, from a maple twig, near the schoolhouse. "Wollie Woodchuck ate too many hot griddlecakes for supper, and is sick this morning, and as for Slimy Snail and Tillie Turtle, they started last night, so the crowd would not leave them behind."

"HERE IS OUR LODGE," SAID BUSY BEAVER; "IT WILL BE DRY AND COZY INSIDE WHERE WE SHALL LIVE."

Busy Beaver and Brother Binney Beaver were delighted to see their visitors, and welcomed them gladly. Slimy Snail and Tillie Turtle were already there.

The beavers had finished their canal, which was now filled with water, and small grayish logs from the poplar grove floated on its surface.

Mollie Muskrat, Minnie Mink and Chirpy Chipmunk had a merry game of tag on the bobbing logs.

"It must have been a vast amount of work to dig so long a canal," said Mr. Wise Owl. "Why, I never could have done it, with all my knowledge."

"Here is our lodge," said Busy Beaver; "it will be dry and cozy inside, where we shall live, even though the lower part stands in water."

"Here is our diving hole and dock," said Brother Binney. "We have worked hard on that, for we like a chance for a deep plunge, and built the dock high and firm."

"Over here," pointed out Busy Beaver, "is our sun parlor. One reason why I liked this spot was because of this dry, white sandy strip on the shore."

"I see you have a fine dam started," said Racky Coon. "However have you done so much work in such a short time?"

The Bunny Babies had a nice ride in their cart, but the Little Badgers had walked, and were tired. The oldest Little Badger crawled out over the partly built dam to where a little hollow had been left, and curled down for a nap.

"Come, Cubby Bear," called Racky Coon, "let us see what we can do to help our friends. That dam needs to be built much higher. I will put on some fresh mud, and you bring up a piece of poplar from the canal to go atop of it!"

Racky splashed his load of mud into the hollow which the eldest Little Badger had taken for a bed. He did not waken. But when Cubby Bear dropped a big stick into place, a howl arose, which so startled Cubby Bear that he tumbled over backward in the water.

"Where, where is my child?" shrieked Betty Badger, in a panic of fear.

The Little Badger was soon dug out, and the mud carefully washed from him in the Big Brook.

"It's in my eyes!" he whimpered. "And it's in my mouth—and it's in my nose, so I can't breathe!"

"A pretty piece of business!" growled Betty Badger. "Throwing mud and logs on a poor innocent! How would they like it themselves?"

"I am sorry," said Cubby Bear. "I did not mean to hurt him."

"Here," offered Racky Coon, drawing something from his vest pocket; "here is a piece of real maple sugar—taste it and see how sweet and good it is!"

The oldest Little Badger seized it in both forepaws, and began eating it greedily.

The four other Little Badgers stood watching their brother enviously.

"Why should he have all the petting and maple sugar?" they asked each other. Putting their little heads together, they made a plan, then went to the dock beside the beavers' diving hole. "One, two, three—all together!" they whispered.

A sudden splash was heard, and a cry went up, "The Little Badgers! They are in the plunging hole!"

A crowd gathered round, and watched while Busy Beaver and Brother Binney dashed into the water. They soon came out on the shore, each of them carrying two dripping Little Badgers.

The wet little creatures were crying loudly, but casting triumphant looks at each other.

"Now where is our maple sugar?" they demanded.

"They meant to fall in!" declared the oldest Little Badger. "I saw them planning together."

"I have no more sugar," said Racky Coon, turning his pockets inside out.

"They deserve none!" said Betty Badger severely. "Giving us a fright like this, and spoiling the party! Come with me!" she added sternly, and drove them before her to a thicket near by, from which loud cries were soon heard.

"They're getting spanked!" said their brother solemnly.

By the time Wise Owl and his pupils were ready to leave the beavers' new home, it was long past school hours, and it was decided not to go back to the sugar-house, but to their own homes instead.

"Ah, me!" sighed Betty Badger. "We have so far to go—my children and I. They will be so tired I can never get them to school in the morning!"

"Come home with me," said Cubby Bear. "Mamma Bruin would love to have you stay all night at her house.

"Come and see us again, all of you," said Busy Beaver and Brother Binney Beaver, as they shook paws with their visitors and bade them good by.

Mamma Bruin welcomed Betty Badger and her five children kindly.

"The Little Badgers are tired and sleepy," she said. "They must go to bed as soon as supper is over."

They were laid in a row in Cubby Bear's bed, to sleep, but just before their mother put them to bed, Cubby Bear took the four younger ones into a corner and gave them each a bit of beautiful wild bees' honey, which Mamma Bruin kept in a jar, to comfort them for the sugar they had expected, but did not get.

ADDRESS all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. See Instructions at the close of this Department.

DEAR COMFORT: Is it too late to boom Uncle Charlie for President on an Independent ticket? There must be men smart enough to get him nominated. I would love to see him in the White House. He can lie in bed and guide the government the same as President Wilson has. We are getting sick of the times we are having. It is nothing but strikes and hard times with us. The rough and scum of the old countries are coming in and they must have a pull as they are taking up the good jobs on the farms. I think Uncle Charlie would clean them out and give us a good government as the last few years farmers have only made ends meet. They took our boys (those that did not enlist got drafted) and left us farmers without help and now they want to help the people over there. Let them go to work and help themselves, they have done damage enough. Let them work instead of fighting among themselves and let the government give us a chance to make a living and get on our feet again. They have taken all we have for taxes, bonds, school tax and they even went into the cellars and wanted the canned fruit. How are we to do our canning this fall if we don't have sugar? Get a hustle on Mr. Gannett and boom Uncle Charlie as we all love him and his writings are so good. I am just an old lady and an old subscriber. MRS. GEORGE BOLSON.

Dear Friend, I thank you for the honor you would confer on me, but I would not accept the job at any price. In your letter you have allowed your emotions to run away with your judgment. Your view of conditions is similar to that held by the average individual, but the average person has little time to read or study, and he would not think if he had the ability and if he did think he'd probably think wrong. All he is certain of is that things do not suit him because he is not in a mood to be suited, not even if you gave him the earth, and he would rather kick, howl and destroy than say a cheerful word or do some constructive work. The faith you place in my ability to bring order out of chaos is touching and beautiful, but, my dear lady, the world is suffering from a thousand ills, and if you would read and study as I have to do you would know that no living soul on earth and only God Almighty in His heaven could bring about ideal conditions, which, if they suited you, might displease everyone else..

The human vision is so limited and few try to enlarge it, and it takes a broad mind and a far-seeing eye to visualize, understand and interpret the motives of the various contending elements that make up our social system. Some of these elements build and others destroy, and those who would upbuild are constantly menaced by those who would tear down. Now is the time to show fortitude and patience, to boost and not to knock. You can't go through hell without being singed and burns do not heal in a minute. It cost money and blood to down the Prussian menace and it will take money and blood to down the Bolshevist menace. We should not kick for we are only paying in money what other people have paid in oceans of blood. Before you can have ideal conditions you must have ideal people, people who think as much of the general as they do of the individual good. You will only find those conditions in a Christ world, and people don't want a Christ world; they want a jazz, a flivver and a fool, crazy, bughouse world. Before the war the world was gradually forging ahead toward better conditions, and though millions were discontented, as they always will be, people realized that work had to be done and did it as a matter of course. There were radical parties but their desire was to rebuild and not to destroy. People were in the mood to discuss anything that seemed to hold a promise of progress and betterment. Five years of war brought out all the heroic and also all the vicious tendencies in human nature. People are crazed and hysterical, they are suspicious of everybody and their only thought is to give as little as possible in return for value received. Before the war, men had, or thought they had, a definite goal they were striving to reach. War madness, the breaking down of old ideals and ideas have had a vicious and demoralizing effect on the masses as a whole. The war made it necessary to loan billions, borrow billions and spend billions. All our standards of value went overboard and with them went moral standards as well. People showed their patriotism, not by settling down to steady work which alone could defeat the enemy, but in rushing madly to every section of the country in quest of the job that paid the highest wage. On Monday a fifty-cent man got ten dollars for holding a monkey-wrench in his left hand and gazing at the scenery. On inquiring what he should do the next day he was told to shift the monkey-wrench into his right hand and draw another ten. Then he drew his pay and loafed for the rest of the week. Our greatest orators left their pulpits to inject pep and patriotism into men who could not visualize the menace of the German terror or rise above the level of mere bellyism. The fact that labor could not visualize this menace, however, is not surprising when we consider that one of our presidential candidates failed to see anything in the sinking of the Lusitania that affected us, our honor or safety, and to please his German-Americ-Hun supporters filled the columns of his newspaper with dope that must have made the Kaiser's heart leap with joy.

Some day I hope we will reverse things and if we are called on to fight, let the men on the firing line, gassed, slaughtered and mangled; smothered in filth, vermin and slime; let these get the ten dollars a day and give thirty dollars a month to the gentlemen who were picking their teeth with monkey-wrenches and sleeping in comfortable beds far from the scene of slaughter and danger. It was the billions poured out by ourselves and other nations during the war and that were spent far behind the battle line, that turned men's heads and has upset the whole foundation of our economic and financial system.

Suppose they did take the canned fruit out of your cellar, my dear friend (and they did not do it without paying you for it), wasn't that better than having the Germans take it and hitting you over the head while they were doing it? Pity people can't see straight on such a simple proposition. I don't want the rough and scum of the old countries here, but these people have to pay a big price for transportation, eighteen dollars a head to get in, and if we did not have them to dig our sewers, build our railroads, bridges and tunnels and do the rough work our American aristocracy of labor simply will not do (but would do darned quick if I were President), we'd be in a much worse fix than we are now. Remember most of us were rough and scum immigrants once. Why do you object to having our boys drafted? Would you have preferred them to stay home and raise crops for the Kaiser? If the war had not been fought over there it would have been fought over here and your farm would have been the scene of some of the bloodiest battles. In helping the people "over there," as you call them, we are simply applying the first principle of human nature and that is self-preservation. We are not helping them from any philanthropic or altruistic motives, and what they get they will have to pay for later on. It's a business proposition—that's all. Those that can work are working, but millions are so undernourished and underfed they have not the ability or ambition to work, and what is more they have no raw materials to work with. There are people in Europe, delicate, refined, invalid ladies, who have been eating that vile stuff called war bread for nearly five years—two invalids I know of, one very low with consumption, had only an ounce of butter a week between them during the whole war period. It was only in Ireland they were able to live on the fat of the land. There they were neither drafted, rationed nor bombed by Zeppelins and war brought little suffering.

You can't reorganize vast sections of a continent inhabited by races thousands of years older than our own; conciliate all contending factions, satisfy all ambitions and get people who have been shell shocked by the most horrible war in all history working like bits of machinery in a single day. Here is an opinion expressed by Marshal Foch, which bears upon the matter we are discussing. In an interview given to a correspondent of the New York Times, the world's greatest soldier and the greatest man the war produced, spoke thus: "It is most likely that the United States is partly responsible for the present uneasiness of the world. By keeping apart from us, America has helped to produce disorders in Central Europe and prevented the establishment of the economic equilibrium. At the same time it (the U. S.) gravely prejudices its own interests." In our anxiety to keep down expenses which were not kept down, and to bring the boys home to satisfy fond parents and doting relatives, we scuttled out of Europe before conditions were stabilized. We went over to help cut the cancer of militarism out of the Old World, but you can't eradicate a cancer without getting at the roots, and these, which needed drastic treatment, were left to be exorcised by the incantations of a well-meaning idealist who displayed little knowledge of, and less ability to deal with, European problems. The roots naturally started to grow, and instead of disarmament the whole world is forced again to arm to the teeth, and it is in this appalling atmosphere of disease, starvation, suffering, doubt, despair, taxation and mental and physical torture that Bolshevism finds a fertile soil, and Bolshevism is a pestilence and not an idea of government, degeneracy instead of democracy, fanaticism instead of faith and morals, a scourge instead of a blessing, tyranny instead of freedom, slavery instead of liberty. Our relations with the Old World are so closely interwoven, politically, socially, financially and racially (for we all came from over there, we are the fruit of Europe's loins, the child of her maturity and are linked to her by a million ties) that whatever deeply affects her sooner or later affects us. German frightfulness did not hit California very hard and many people on the coast could not see the necessity of fighting the German menace. Now the shoe is on the other foot; California has a Jap menace and cannot understand why we in the East are not arming to fight Japan. Such is human(?) nature, alive only to its own selfish interests and indifferent to that of others.

We shall forever be confronted by menaces of various kinds until the law-abiding, peace-loving peoples of the earth put their heads together and evolve some scheme by which international problems can be discussed and adjusted. These problems can usually be settled by conciliation, arbitration or by drastic economic pressure (for no nation is entirely sufficient unto itself), and if these correctives failed, then by overwhelming force. If such a force had been in existence there would have been no Kaiserism, no Bolshevism and no fears of worse terrors that may yet engulf humanity in seas of blood and thrust us back into the jungle. We must hang together or hang separately We are sailing uncharted seas, and all good men and true of this and every nation should do their level best to keep the good ship Civilization from being submerged. Don't talk about isolation, "there ain't no sech animile," and if there were, God Almighty would not allow such a selfish animal to exist. Prussia did not invade our shores, but the Prussian flu did, and the monkey-wrench Germany threw into the machinery of the world, and the madness of Bolshevism, have so upset the whole universe that Mrs. Bolson finds herself short of sugar, my bed is still a leg shy and all our people are acting as though, instead of abolishing prohibition, we had soused them to the gills with wood alcohol and explosive beer. There is no panacea, no cure-all for human ills, for what pleases one man is sure to displease the other and there is no one big enough to rectify in one day all the damage that has been done by the war, and no electric pushbutton that will usher in the millenium; only evolution slow and painful will bring us to the land of our dreams.

Let us be thankful someone is taking the jobs on the farms. If Americans won't produce food, let the foreigner with the enthusiasm of the pioneer do it. It is the lack of this enthusiasm, the lowering of our moral and spiritual standards, the ugly spirit of greed and graft which animates all classes, and which is part of the aftermath of war, that is causing the troubles that affect not only you but all of us. Complaining and whining will get us nowhere, nagging, snarling and fighting will do no good. We have a man's job before us and the only way to complete it is to take off our coats and go to work, quit agitating and grouching and go to producing, for work is the only cure for the ills that beset this or any country. Please remember things have been smashed to pieces and you can't put them together again in a minute. As one writer puts it: "With the end of hostilities there started the world war of theories, ideals and idiosyncracies, the composite mind of the world (and we had such a mind before the war) in breaking up and getting ready for peace is like the breaking up of a hard winter and getting ready for spring. In the latter case there is neither winter nor spring; in the former, neither war nor peace. At this stage the fogs of false doctrine retard the hopes of better days." Stand fast in the faith, do your bit, fight evil in every form and open wide your hearts so that the Christ may come in, and all may yet be well."

Don't forget that Uncle Charlie's four wonderful books may still be had. Start in at once to obtain them—they cost you no money, only a very little time and effort—and keep at it until you have the entire set. The book of Poems is beautifully bound in ribbed silk stiff covers; the Story Book is bound in two styles, the one in ribbed silk stiff covers like the Poems, the other in paper covers! the Song Book is bound only in heavy paper covers, and the Picture Book in handsome stiff covers. Poems or the Story Book in ribbed silk covers, either one for a club of three subscriptions; the Song Book or the Story Book in handsome paper covers or the Picture Book in pretty stiff covers for a club of only two subscriptions. These four books are a library of endless joy and merriment, the best medicine to drive away the blues and the best gifts in the world.

My Picture Book, too, has started a deluge of inquiries: Is Billy the Goat my daughter? Is Maria her ma? Is there an Aunt Charlie? Is the big boy in the Picture Book my only baby? I have had a little leaflet specially printed answering all these questions fully, and those who are interested will find the same in every copy of the four Uncle Charlie books sent out this season.

Now for the letters.

DECATUR, Brown Co., OHIO.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

Will you kindly give your opinion of the endless prayer chain letters. I enclose a sample sent me so you can see how they read. The country is full of them. I would greatly appreciate your opinion of the enclosed specimen. Please give me a piece of your valuable advice. E. J. ADAMS.

Friend Adams, I have given my opinion of the endless prayer chain business many times in these columns. What a pity so many of you are afflicted with poor memories. I don't know the party who is responsible for reviving this particular exhibition of lunacy. If I did, he or she would at once be taken out and shot. Such letters when they reach people of education and enlightenment are immediately consigned to the waste-paper basket. As these prayer chain letters, however, contain a threat, the ignorant and superstitious, dreading that something may happen to them if they break the chain, copy them and pass them on to terrify others as superstitious and ignorant as themselves. If those who write these letters realized that it means five years in the Federal prison for copying and mailing them, they would be less terrified of what God might do to them, than of what Uncle Sam would do to them. Uncle Sam a few years ago had to jail a lot of people before he could put an end to this prayer fake pestilence. If these letters come to any of you unsigned, burn them. If a signature is attached and the writer's address given, forward the letter to the Postmaster General, Washington, D. C. The post-office inspectors will do the rest and, believe me, when they get through with the prayer chain fanatics they will look like Belgium after the Germans went through it or a small section of Ireland after the Sinn Feiners and Orangemen have held a prayer meeting not of the endless variety. We are constantly pestered by fanatics who importune us to publish a prayer that is supposed to have been found at the foot of the cross. No such prayer was ever found and this is only another specimen of fakes that terrorize the weak and superstitious mind. It takes nine thousand spruce trees to get out the daily newspapers in New York, and a thousand more beautiful trees must bow their heads daily to supply paper for the endless prayer chain fanatics. In the old days of the cave man, if he wanted to write you a polite note informing you that he was coming around to knock you on the head, carry off your wife and make a meal of your children,

Never Sleep

With a film-coat on your teeth

All statements approved by authorities

Millions of people on retiring now combat the film on teeth. They fight it day by day. And those glistening teeth seen everywhere now form one of the results.

You owe yourself a trial of this new teeth-cleaning method. Dentists everywhere advise it. The results it brings are all-important, and they do not come without it.

What film does

Your teeth are coated with a viscous film. Feel it with your tongue. It clings to teeth, enters crevices and stays. And dentists now trace most tooth troubles to it.

The ordinary tooth paste does not end film. So, despite all brushing, much film remains, to cause stain, tartar, germ troubles and decay.

It is the film-coat that discolors, not the teeth. Film is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

Ways to combat it

Dental science, after years of research, has found effective ways to fight film. Able authorities have proved their efficiency. Together they bring, in modern opinion, a new era in teeth cleaning.

These five methods are combined in a dentifrice called Pepsodent—a tooth paste which complies with all the new requirements. And a ten-day tube is now sent free to everyone who asks.

Watch the teeth whiten

You will see and feel results from Pepsodent which brushing never brought you heretofore. A week's use, we think, will amaze you.

One ingredient is pepsin. One multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva, to digest all starch deposits that cling. One multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva to neutralize mouth acids.

Two factors directly attack the film. One of them keeps the teeth so highly polished that film cannot easily cling.

Watch these effects. Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. Note how teeth whiten as the film-coat disappears.

The book we send explains all these results. Judge what they mean to you and yours. Cut out the coupon so you won't forget.

The Missing Princess of Bengal

by W. W. Hatfield

His eyes were roving past them, through them, over them, around them, searching.

Without further hesitation, he took to his heels.

"The Prince of Persia!" gurgled Mary and sprang to meet him.

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub, Inc.

"GOL darn the luck anyhow!" growled the Prince of Persia. "It's no use—I'll never see her again. This is a heck of a Hallowe'en!"

It was minight. As far as the eye could reach, the street was still thronged with indefatigable mummers. Fair damsels there were from the four corners of the earth. Cleopatra beckoned to him from behind the curtains of a sedan chair carried by four Australian bushrangers—Morgiana danced before him with her tabor and a poised, glittering, rubber poniard—Lucretia Borgia cast sheep's eyes and confetti upon him—the Queen of Sheba tooted a tin horn in his ear; but the Prince of Persia saw them not. His eyes were roving past them, through them, over them, around them, searching—the thousandth time that night—for the missing Princess of Bengal.

"No use!" he repeated disgustedly. "I'll go chew the rag with Cobb a while."

Heavy hearted, he shouldered his way through a jamb of clowns, red devils and Charlie Chaplins, and turned his steps toward the home of his grand vizier, a sedate, unromantic, young, struggling physician who had been the bosom friend of his college days.

Ten minutes' walk, through streets deserted and dark, brought him to a decrepit brick house, flanked by tottering brick neighbors, fronted by an ancient, dying elm, and labeled with a dingy, brass nameplate bearing the words "Dr. Kincaid Cobb." A cat, hidden in the branches of the elm, rendered a vocal malady in an appropriately cracked voice.

The house was forebodingly dark. Pervaded by a premonition, Prince Feroze-shah hesitated, then turned away—a second too late. A heavy object swished through the branches of the elm, struck him on the back of the head, and felled him.

The door of the house opened. A figure, clad in white, emerged cautiously, with furtive glances up and down the street. Keeping in the shadow of the elm, it crept toward the Prince.

After an amazing interlude of stellar attractions, Feroze-shah got slowly to his hands and knees and picked up the object which had struck him. It was a shoe, a large, heavy man's shoe, somewhat worn, but still good—and people do not throw good shoes at innocent bystanders without good reasons, even on Hallowe'en. Assault? Again premonition visited the Prince. His quick ear caught the rustle of dry leaves. Turning his head, he glimpsed the white-clad figure creeping upon him from the shadow of the elm.

Without further hesitation, he took to his heels. The figure bounded forward, clutched at him, missed, and slunk back to its hiding place.

Three blocks away Feroze-shah stopped, panting, under an arc light. He was still clutching the shoe. The light shone into it, revealing on the lining, a blotch of red. Closer examination resolved the blotch into letters and words, whose blurred, indistinct outlines and irregular spacing suggested that they had been put there with great pains and a blunt instrument dipped in red ink—or blood. The Prince's mouth fell agape as he spelled them out:

FRED HELP
1820 Camden Ave
KIN COBB

Within the purple, royal robe of Feroze-shah, Prince of Persia, the Hallowe'en heart of Fred Shaw, shoe salesman, doubled its pace.

"If it were anybody but Kin," he gasped, "I'd say it was a Hallowe'en trick. But Kin's too darn solemn. Gosh! Wonder whether that's ink or blood?"

A vision of Cobb, imprisoned in a darkened room, scrawling the message with splinters of wood dipped in his own blood, flashed before him.

"Gosh!" he repeated, wiping cold sweat from his forehead.

Then came a flicker of doubt.

"How in thunder did the darn shoe get over here?" he questioned. "Let's see—1820 Camden—Cobb's number's 1819 Campbell—Camden's one block east—that would make 1820 right in the rear of Cobb's place. If they had him in a backroom, upstairs, he could—gosh—that's what he'd done—he's throwed that shoe clean over the house. No wonder it hit hard."

With a rueful rub at the back of his head, he stuffed the shoe into his robe, walked swiftly up the cross street and turned into the alley between Camden and Campbell. Here, as he made his cautious way, he reflected on the identity of the white-clad figure.

"Probably one of the holdup gang," he decided. "Saw Kin throw the shoe and beat it over to pick it up. Lucky I lit out when I did. Kin must have figured I'd be there a little after midnight," he went on, again rubbing the back of his head, "but I wish he hadn't figured so darn close."

As quietly as a wooden Indian, he traversed the three blocks of alley. In the rear of 1820 Camden he paused, pondering his next move and searching his pockets in the hope of discovering something that would answer the purpose of a weapon. In his hip pocket was a bill-fold. In his vest pocket he found a diamond ring, of the variety worn by young ladies as a symbol of impending matrimony. This latter article he had purchased shortly after last Hallowe'en, with the serious intention of bestowing it upon the finger of a young lady who had masqueraded at that time in the costume of the Princess of Bengal. Only he had never been able to find the young lady.

"Darn fool that I am!" he said to himself as he thrust it back in his vest pocket. "Talked to her for three hours and never even asked her name."

The rear view of 1820 Camden was of a two-story, brick structure, wrapped in darkness and story and two in the second, all heavily shuttered.

The vines were thick and heavy, and Shaw was an agile young man. He found a foothold and began to climb. In his dark purple robe, and with the moon—now in its first quarter—fitfully obscured by clouds, he was all but invisible.

He reached the second-story window on the right and tapped lightly on the shutter. Receiving no answer, he worked his way across to the other window and repeated the signal. There was no response here; so, after a short wait, he continued the ascent until, after a hard scramble at the eaves, he managed to gain the roof. This feat involved noise, so much noise that, lying flat upon that part of the digestive system which a snake uses for crawling, he spent fully five minutes in breathless expectation of an outburst below him; but nothing happened.

Reassured at length, he started on a hands-and-knees voyage of exploration. Near the peak of the roof he found what he sought—a trap door, into which an iron ring was fitted.

The rusty hinges creaked a shrill, doleful alarm as he raised the door. Again he flattened himself and listened, certain that he must have been overheard. And again he was encouragingly disappointed. A fitful wind was now blowing, the sough of which, he hoped, had drowned the unfortunate creak.

By judicious use of the sense of touch, he discovered the top rung of a ladder. Keeping his hands on this, he squirmed about until he sat with his feet dangling into nothingness. The very position gave him a feeling of insubstantiality and shivers. The pit of intensified, Stygian blackness that yawned beneath him repelled him with a thousand imaginative terrors. The absolute silence of the place was a torture to his nerves.

"Gosh!" he breathed noiselessly. "This is a heck of a Hallowe'en! If it were anybody but Kin, I'd beat it."

Very gingerly, he entrusted his weight to the ladder. Step by slow step he descended, until his feet rested upon the beams of an unfloored attic. Then, suddenly, the freakish October wind howled across the roof, banging the trap door with a detonation that reverberated through the house like thunder. From somewhere below him came a woman's shrill, drawn-out scream of terror—then silence, tense, absolute, almost tangible silence.

It seemed to Shaw that he stood there for ages, mopping the clammy sweat of fear from his forehead, waiting, waiting, waiting for something to happen. Yet nothing did; and, after a while, courage, or at least a satiety of darkness and inaction, came to him. He struck a match.

The tiny point of light stabbed feebly into the blackness of the great attic. Old furniture, old clothes, old books, old magazines—all those indescribable odds and ends which accumulate in attics of long-used houses—leaped into vie out of all proportion to their size. A path of boards, laid loosely across the beams, led into the proximate oblivion. Striking another match, Shaw followed the boards.

He came, in time, to a steep, narrow stairway. Here he sat down, removed his shoes, and hung them around his neck. Then, on tiptoe, he descended.

The little door at the bottom led into a hall, on each side of which were two closed doors, and, at the end, another stairway leading on down to the first floor. He tried the first door to the right, found it unlocked, and pushed it open. The room was empty. He continued the investigation. All four rooms were empty.

Growing bolder, he descended to the first floor, striking matches as he went. He found the room at the foot of the stairs as bare as those he had just visited, and through the open double door, could see that the front room, or parlor, was also innocent of furnishings.

In the kitchen he came across the first signs of habitation—a stove, but no fire, a table, a rickety chair, a cupboard containing a few cracked dishes, a work-bench and a miscellany of shoemaker's tools. To all appearances, the place had been the abode and workshop of a cobbler, but the absence of finished or unfinished shoes, as well as the disarray of the tools, indicated that he had gone. Provisions of an edible nature had also established a complete alibi. Even a coal-oil lamp, which held out a moment's promise of a better lighting system, proved to be dry.

In one corner of the cupboard were two opened envelopes, addressed to Mary Phelps, 1820 Camden Ave. One contained a bill, dated three days before, for eight dollars and forty cents, from a nearby grocery, together with a curt note informing Mary that positively no further credit would be extended until amount due was paid. The other was a formal notice from the sheriff, to the effect that the property at 1820 Camden Avenue would be sold at auction on the following day, to meet demands of the creditors of the estate of the late Frederick Phelps.

There remained for investigation but one room—that adjoining the kitchen. Striking his last match, Shaw turned the knob. The door was locked.

The last match was flickering. There was no time to be wasted on conservative methods of ingress. He pointed one broad shoulder to the jamb and lunged. The flimsy bolt was torn from its socket. The door swung inward.

Again, a shrill, long-drawn scream of terror rang in his ears. He had a fleeting, confused glimpse of a woman, swaying, wildly, by a low cot from which, it seemed, it had just risen, and falling—falling—then the match burned his fingers and went out, immersing him in total darkness. He heard the woman fall, heavily, to the floor.

After the first brief, inactive moment of breathless surprise, Shaw groped his way to the window, opened it and flung wide the heavy shutters. His mind was a bubbling cauldron of ideas, that of escape struggling to boil over first.

Straight ahead of him, a light shone from an old vine. There were two windows in the first upstairs window. It was the bedroom window of Dr. Kincaid Cobb. While Shaw gazed, Cobb, himself, clad in a nightshirt, came to the window, placidly removed from his mouth and tossed away the glowing butt of a cigar, and extinguished the light.

"Holy horned owls!" burst out Shaw. "Safe and sound at home—and me tryin' to rescue him!"

Again he saw the scene in Cobb's front yard—the shoe—the white-clad figure creeping upon him, and revelation burst upon him in the shape of a nightshirt.

"It was him," he exclaimed, ungramatically ferocious, "him—in his darned old nightshirt—that chased me down the street. Oh, yes! Kin's too darn solemn to play a Hallowe'en trick! Hump! I'll drag him out of bed and make him eat this shoe."

Almost, in his sudden revulsion of emotion, had he forgotten the woman. Now, as he turned and saw her, by the faint light that struggled in through the window, huddled upon the floor, a sudden spasm of fear gripped him. One of her hands stretched out limply, grotesquely, to his very foot. He gathered enough courage to touch it. It was cold, clammy, but still feebly pulsing. Stooping, he lifted her easily, in his arms.

"I'll just pack her over to Doc's," he grunted, as he groped his way to the kitchen door.

Gingerly, in his sock feet, he picked his way across the alley and pounded lustily at Cobb's back door.

"Open up," he bellowed, "you darned old resurrected fossil of a Hallowe'en joker!"

A leisurely pattering of footsteps within the house followed this demand. In a few moments Cobb, in dressing gown and slippers, opened the door. He eyed Fred and his burden without a glimmer of curiosity. If a pink rhinocerous had strolled into his office carrying a kangeroo with the toothache, Kincaid Cobb's face would not have lost its matter-of-fact expression.

He took the lady from Shaw's arms, carried her into the next room, and laid her on a couch.

"Turn on that light, Fred," he ordered.

"Hump!" he grunted, as the light came on. "It's Mary Phelps. Fred, go out to the ice box and get a glass of fresh milk and a glass of port."

Shaw complied. While he was rummaging for the articles he heard the woman gasp with returning consciousness.

"The burglar!" she exclaimed, weakly. "Where is he?"

"He's gone," answered Cobb, in the tone one reserves for delirious people and mild lunatics. "What did you have for supper, Mary? Don't lie, now!"

"I didn't have any," confessed Mary.

"Nor any dinner, nor breakfast, nor anything all day yesterday," supplemented the doctor. "I thought so. Broke?"

Silence.

"Lost your job?"

More silence.

"Why didn't you tell me?"

Still more silence.

"See here, Mary. When your father died, I promised him I'd look after you, but I've sort of fallen down on the job. Of course, that was only a couple of months ago, and I thought he left a little money. Besides, there's the house, and the furniture——"

"I sold the furniture to pay debts," interrupted Mary. "The sheriff's gonna sell the house to pay the rest of 'em tomorrow. I can't hold a job because I don't know how. Father never would let me learn. He always said a woman's place was in the house."

"It is—eventually," protested Cobb. "Your father's ideas were better than his shoemaking. Not but what he was a good cobbler, but his ideas were better than a cobbler could afford to have. I think you've inherited the disease. Here's this high-falutin' idea you've got about marrying that scion of nobility you met last——"

A protracted sniffle interrupted his tirade.

"Fred, confound you," he went on, placidly, "hurry up with that stuff. This girl's starving."

Shaw had been standing at the door, listening. He now made a hasty entrance, a glass of milk in one hand and a glass of port in the other. The girl was sitting up on the couch. At sight of the royal milk-bearer in his sock feet, with his turban askew and his shoes hanging around his neck, her pale cheeks first went paler, then blossomed into a pinky red. She put one hand to her heart.

The tumblers dropped from Shaw's hands. He took a step forward and stood, arms outstretched, sock feet dabbling in an oozy puddle of milk and port.

"The Princess of Bengal!" he exclaimed dramatically.

"The Prince of Persia!" gurgled Mary, and sprang to meet him.

"Humph!" grunted Cobb. "Scion of nobility! Humph! His head's made out of the carcass of the Hindu's wooden horse."

He retrieved the tumblers, which had been saved from destruction by the thick rug, carried them to the kitchen and refilled them. But, instead of returning immediately, he stood in the door for a moment, watching the tableau, after which he decided to go and put on his shoes before he caught cold, and climbed the stairs to his bedroom. He could only find one shoe, and when he had put that on he lit a cigar, which he smoked, placidly, sitting by his window, until the fiery end of the shortening weed threatened destruction to his mustache. Not until then did he toss the glowing butt out the window and creep back down the stairs. He reached the door in time to see Feroze-shah fumble in his vest pocket and produce a diamond ring, with which he encircled the third finger of the left hand of the blushing Princess of Bengal, sealing the act in the manner approved by convention.

"Drink this," ordered Cobb, in his sharpest professional tone, extending the glass of port to his patient.

Mary unwound herself from Fred's arm and obeyed.

"And this," following it with the glass of milk.

"Now," he commanded, when the milk had disappeared, "upstairs to bed with you. Fred and I'll bunk on the couch and watch for burglars."

Laughing, Mary tripped up the stairs. When she was gone, Cobb turned to Shaw.

"Well," he drawled, "how did it all happen?"

"Little innocence, ain't you?" mocked Fred, fumbling beneath the voluminous folds of his robe. "Here's your darn shoe."

Cobb turned the shoe over thoughtfully.

"Humph!" he grunted. "I threw that thing at a cat about two hours ago, and when I sneaked down after it in my nightshirt some guy was streaking down the street with it. How did you get it?"

"Likely story!" Shaw commented. "And that writing on the lining? I suppose that just crawled in accidentally—eh?"

"Writing?" Cobb's face puckered into a grin as he spelled it out. "Humph! Funny I never noticed that. Real funny! So that's how you found her—eh? Well—well!"

Altogether imperturbed, he took off the other shoe and examined the lining.

"That writing," he observed, "was put in there with a rubber stamp by the fellow that made the shoe. The same thing's in this shoe, but there aren't so many letters worn out. Read it."

Shaw craned his neck over his friend's shoulder and peered into the second shoe. These are the words that he found:

The Harvest They Chose

YOUNG Howard Gilpin stood upon the station platform of the little town of Red Fern, gazing with expectant longing down the track. Just beyond lay bounteous fields with great regiments of corn-shocks marshalled in marching order with here and there golden pumpkins mellowing in the sun.

This evidence of Nature's blessing did not interest him. No, it was a sight he had too often seen and one which he now vowed he would not look upon next year. For it meant that, living in that neighborhood with his post-office address as "Red Fern," he was simply a farmer and he longed to be a city man.

His dress indicated this for he was clad in a most becoming suit of clothes, and his hat, shoes, tie and silk shirt made up a faultless tout ensemble.

For some time he paced up and down the station platform, then at length a smothered wail told of the approaching train. A little longer wait, then the click upon the rails became more distinct and finally the iron monster dashed up with a braggadocio quite forgivable.

There were but two passengers for Red Fern, a well-set-up man in his early thirties who alighted from the parlor car, and a dainty wisp of a girl who came from the passenger coach.

Young Gilpin waved to the man, but hurried to the girl, nevertheless.

"Hello, Amy," he said boyishly, "I'm so glad you came."

In the moment he had "sized her up" from her trim white shoes to the top of her chic woven-straw hat which was also white. Her traveling dress was of a green silk-poplin, its style a reflection from fashion's glass.

This decidedly citified young woman was Amy Colvin, Amy who had gone to the city a few years before and now came back with all the earmarks of having made good.

She smiled happily into his eyes as she returned his greeting.

"I've got to see that man, Amy, he's my brother Chester's friend, Earl Stewart, and he's coming to stay with us for a while. I'm to bring him home. I've got our new Spread Eagle car, though, so I'll set him down at the house and then take you home. You remember Earl Stewart?"

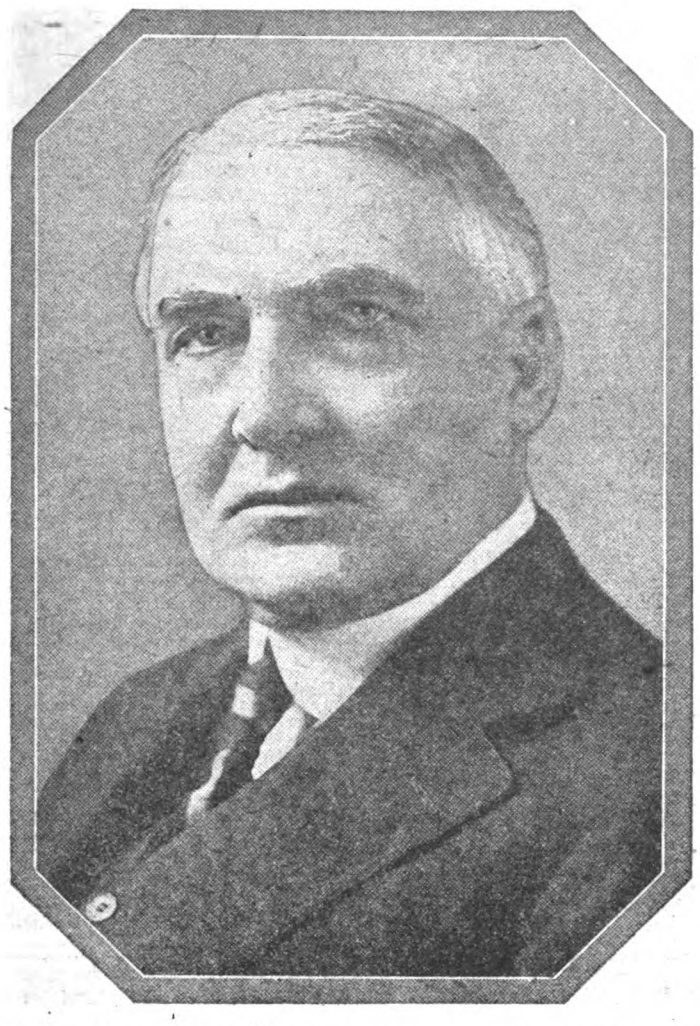
"Oh, yes," she returned.

"Chester thinks there's no one like him and I can't blame him for he's been a mighty good friend to my brother. Come, we'll join him," and accordingly they did.

"I'm glad to see you, Earl," Howard began, "and sorry to have made you wait, but——" he stopped significantly.

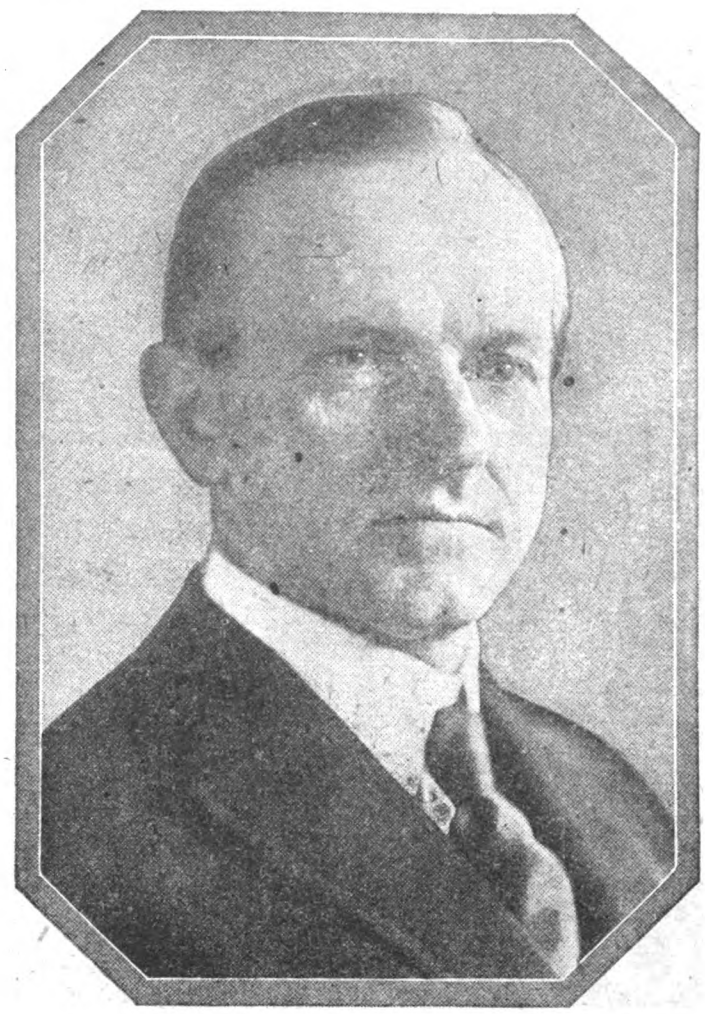
Mr. Stewart laughed.

"Always favor the lady, especially if you wish to win her favor——" and now he suddenly paused for from the attitude of the couple he saw that he had referred to a status between the two which apparently did not exist.



"I beg your pardon if I have been rude," he said quietly.

"Oh, that's all right," Miss Colvin replied indifferently.



Her tone struck coldly upon Howard's heart.

Women! For Your Own Good

Vote the Republican Ticket

From the beginning of time woman has been the enemy of War.

From the beginning of time she has been its most unhappy victim.

In proportion as woman's influence molds the politics of nations wars will diminish.

For woman is for peace.

* * * * * *

American women are being asked in this campaign to vote for the Democratic candidate for President because he is pledged to the Treaty of Versailles and the Covenant for a league of nations contained therein. They are told this covenant creates the league of peace of which good and great men have dreamed through many centuries. They are told it is a covenant of peace that will end all war.

Four years ago the same party asked for votes for the Democratic President because "he kept us out of war." He got them and five months later the United States entered the world war.

Is it wise to recall that, now that we are asked once more to vote for a Democratic candidate because he will commit us to a covenant that will keep the world out of war?

The American woman asks

The American woman asks of her country:

That it be a secure place for her home and for her children and that it be security with honor.

That it give her children opportunity to lead their lives even better than she and her husband led theirs.

That it be just in its relations with other nations and merit the pride which the best of its citizens have in it, in its history and its ideals.

A policy which has these purposes will have the support of American womanhood and American motherhood. That is the Republican policy and has been Republican policy from the days of Abraham Lincoln.

The Republican policy is to protect the security of the United States by preserving its right to make decisions regarding its action in the future as events in the future demand. The Republican party is unwilling to pledge now that it will protect European boundary lines and to deprive congress of the power to say in each case what the action of the United States will be.

The Republican party believes that to be dangerous to the children of the nation who will be of soldier age in years to come because it prevents them, through the congressmen they elect, from deciding what they would do and say now that they then will defend European territory.

Mothers' duty to their sons

No mother would make that pledge for her son when he was two years old and have it rest upon him when he was twenty-one. No wise woman would have her nation make that pledge and have it rest upon the citizens of the next generation who are children today.

Citizenship is a trusteeship and such a pledge is a violation of the rights of a ward. The American scheme of government, which has made this a land of freedom and security, provides that decisions shall be made by congress. That protects the people who must act.

* * * * * *

If Harding and Coolidge are elected no such pledge will be made. The United States will enter an association of nations to promote peace and humanity but the sons of no American mother will go to war unless the representatives elected by the people and responsible to them say that it is necessary. In that case mothers will give their sons. In no other case ought they to give them.

* * * * * *

The making of war is a solemn and terrible duty when it comes. Some mothers may be mistaken. They may be misled by the false promises of the Democratic party. They may think that the league of nations will stand between their sons and rifles. There is greater probability that it will put rifles in the hands of their sons. President Wilson's covenant pledges American boys to every war in Europe and Cox upholds that covenant.

The Republican party insists upon protecting the security of the American home and the future of American children. Every war in Europe is not necessarily an American war. Let congress in each case decide, without a pledge in advance.

Fair deal and fair chance

The second point in a woman's concern is that her children should find conditions of life encouraging, inspiring and fit to produce comfort and character. The Republican domestic policy is for the strengthening and protecting of all elements which keep life on a high plane. It has been under Republican administration that this country has been an asylum for the less happy peoples of Europe, the land of promise and a haven.

The Fair Deal was the Roosevelt doctrine. The Fair Chance is the Harding doctrine. That is what the American woman wants for her children—the Fair Deal and the Fair Chance.

Under Republican administration the United States has been just in its relations to other nations and its ideals are the ideals of peace and humanity. A Republican administration freed Cuba. A Republican administration freed Porto Rico. A Republican administration gave the Filipinos a system of self government with free schools and the advantages of peace. A Republican administration gave back the indemnity to China when other nations held her financially responsible for the Boxer rebellion.

Our only war of conquest

The only war we ever fought that could in any sense be called a war of conquest, the war with Mexico, was declared by a Democratic President and Congress.

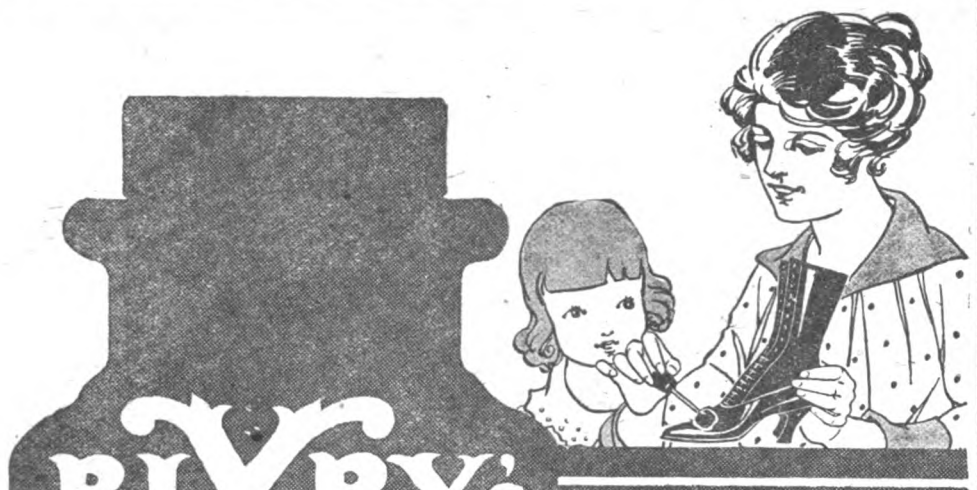
The Republican has been at all times a party of honorable peace, but it has always stood and stands today for the independence of the United States and puts its trust in the righteousness of the American people to serve the cause of peace in their own way, according to the dictates of their own conscience and in the exercise of their own free will.

Your needs demand a change

You demand a change in the White House in Washington.

You demand this change in the interests of your overburdened life, your overtaxed purse, your overanxious mind.

You know how you have fared under this Democratic administration.



You know how doubly hard it has been for you as manager of the family funds.

Yours has been one constant struggle trying to keep the home and the table supplied—trying to pay big bills with little dollars.

You know we have always had good times under Republican management of our public affairs.

Your interest as a woman, your interest as a mother, your interest as a citizen, your interest as the financial manager of the home, combine to require the return to Republican principles.

The Harvest They Chose

He was young and very much in love with Amy and in addition to his natural restlessness, Amy's being in the city made him want to leave the farm the more to become a city dweller.

More determined than ever now to go back to the city where Amy did, he led the way to the new car.

"What a splendid machine!" the girl exclaimed.

"Yes. Father paid four thousand dollars for it," Howard answered.

Mr. Stewart eyed it admiringly also.

"You farmers are lucky dogs, now. If I could give up my business and go farming, I would."

"That's the way all city folks talk when they come out to visit their farmer friends," Howard replied bitterly, "but in their hearts they despise us and call us rubes."

"Is that so?" queried Stewart. "My son, do you know the definition of a 'rube'?"

"A farmer, of course," Howard responded.

"Oh, no. A rube is a ninety-five dollar forty-two hour a week city man, who thinks a farmer who raises foodstuffs is going to sell it to him cheap."

Miss Colvin laughed merrily and Howard, perforce, joined.

"Pretty good!" he exclaimed.

"Yes, rather neat, I think. It's not original with me, though." Stewart disclaimed credit for the epigram.

They got into the machine, Miss Colvin on the front seat with Howard, and Mr. Stewart lounging in the rear. And as they started off, Mr. Stewart went on:

"Don't think, Howard, that the city people despise the farmer. If they ever did, they don't now. Just let the farmers strike and see what would happen. The high cost of everything has opened the eyes of the city people to their dependence upon the farmer and they can well tremble at the thought of a farmer's strike. Praise be, though, the farmers as a class are of such generous heart that there probably isn't much danger from that source and to no one do I begrudge the increase in return for his product than I do to the farmer. But come, I guess you don't want to listen to me expound. You two probably have a great deal to talk about, so I'll keep still and rest and enjoy this peaceful landscape."

The car rolled along smoothly and soon reached the Gilpin place. It was a farm as near perfection as could be. All the barns and out-buildings were in fine condition, fields were properly fenced, and everything about the place indicated the close study of a mind that looked upon farming not as an employment fit only for the "rube" or "hayseed" but an honorable employment fitted for the best of minds and talents.

Most of this was due to the unceasing efforts of Chester Gilpin, Howard's brother, who managed the farm for his parents. Howard had just become of age and it was Chester's hope that the young man might go into partnership with him. Not one of those old-time partnerships wherein two families become interested and then find the farm is not big enough for both, but one where each takes from the common store and is charged up with every item just as if it had been purchased from strangers, so that at the end of the season, the produce of the farm is reduced to an actual monetary basis and such a share as each had used, with such an amount had he been charged.

But to this business-like arrangement, Howard had not shown any special enthusiasm—his ambition was to follow Amy Colvin to the city, marry her and live where he could enjoy the lights and pleasures of town. He did not realize that although there is a great deal going on in a large city all the time, the average city man does not partake of much of it; that it is the occasional patronage of the many that keeps the theaters full and the restaurants crowded.

He might have considered it, though, had not the other attraction crowded it out, but to bring Amy back to Red Fern to live on a farm after she had lived in the city for several years was folly to even contemplate, set aside asking or expecting it.

Stewart was soon set down and the car sped on.

"Your farm was always one of the best kept in the vicinity," Amy remarked, "but it seems to me it never looked better before."

"Yes, Chester is the backbone of it. He wants me to go into partnership with him."

"And you are going to do it?" the girl asked, a little eagerly.

"No," he replied slowly. "I'm sick of the farm. I—I—hate it!" he burst out passionately. "I'm going to the city as soon as your vacation is over, Amy. I thought maybe I'd take the same train back with you."

"Oh," she replied, a faint shade of disappointment in her voice.

He noted it and misconstrued it.

"Of course, I don't expect you to try and find me a job or anything like that," wondering if she thought he wanted her to use her influence with her employers. "It's—it's just to have your company, you know."

"I understand. But I was thinking what a fine opportunity you have here. In the city wages are high, of course, but things are horribly expensive so one can't save much. Clothes, food and household furnishings—I don't see how a man dares to get married!"

Why was she discouraging him? Didn't she care for him? He had never spoken a word of love to her, but in all the time she was away, they had corresponded, though never had they exchanged a sentimental word.

They reached the Colvin place at last, though Howard had made the way a circuitous route. Amy's parents lived with a married son who had taken over the farm. Frank Colvin was another of Chester Gilpin's stamp and he fortunately had secured a wife who loved the farm even as he did.

For a moment or two longer, the couple chatted, then Howard extended an invitation:

"The church is going to have a Harvest Supper tonight, Amy. May I take you to that? I'll call for you with the machine—just like city folks," he hazarded jokingly.

"I'd love to go," Amy enthused.

"All right, then. I'll be around at eight," and Howard drove away with a certain elation in his heart. He felt certain that Amy would be the most attractively dressed girl there and he thrilled at the thought of escorting her.

But when evening came, although Amy fulfilled his every expectation, still when they arrived at the church, she did not outshine the others to any appreciable degree, for the idea that country girls are gawkish and tasteless when it comes to dress is guff. Many of the dresses worn by the young ladies at the Harvest Supper were expensive creations, for farmers have asserted themselves and shown that "anything is good enough for the country" is a rank fallacy—at least for dress wear.

The Harvest Supper was an old-fashioned one, but it alone was old-fashioned. The partakers might have been a crowd of city people enjoying a frolic of the sort to judge from the automobiles parked outside the church. The collection would have done credit to an automobile show for it contained everything from the great eight-cylinder seven-passenger tonneau to the nifty sport roadster.

When Howard and Amy arrived, Chester, Miss Barbara Lester, a graceful, dark-haired girl of handsome mien and dignified manners, to whom Chester was engaged, and Mr. Stewart were already there.

Mr. Stewart was talking animatedly, for he knew many of the people. But he did not stand head-over-shoulders over the rest of the men.

In a short while the summons came to supper and they all sat down. Here was a banquet indeed. No banquet in name only with more dishes than food. There was plenty and everyone could eat to his heart's content (without the distressing thought of whether his bill was going to leave anything for carfare home, which is often the predicament of city chaps!)

When it was all over, Chester sought out Amy.

"We're going to have a little outing to Spirit Lake tomorrow, Barbara, Mr. Stewart and I, and we'd like to have you and Howard come. Howard can take you home tonight and get your other things and you can spend the night at our house and mother will chaperon you and Barbara who will also stay. That will give us an earlier start as your folks' place is in the other direction from the lake. Will you come?"

Amy's eyes glowed.

"Indeed, I shall. I thought I was going to dawdle around and do nothing, but here's my second engagement and I've been here only since morning."

"Oh, farmers have gotten away from the idea of keeping their noses to the grindstone all the while. We're quite progressive now. All right, then, I'm glad you'll come. We'll wait up for you even though we are farmers and you're a city lady," he finished mischievously.

"I don't know that you'd notice the difference particularly," she replied as her eyes wandered over the various groups upon the church lawn, all in tasteful dress.

"Well, Red Fern isn't such a way-backer village," he laughed, and with the words he got into his own car, a beautiful Westmorland, and was away.

Howard then helped Amy into his car and drove to her home and shortly returned. True to their promise, Chester, Barbara and Stewart were awaiting them.

The man from the city sat upon the porch steps, his face upturned, lit up by the heavenly moonlight. That face had the city-look, tired, a little drawn and pale, but handsome withal.

"You're enjoying the night, Mr. Stewart?" Howard began.

"Indeed I am. Have you never listened to the music of the night air? Hear that babbling, coming faintly from the creek, and notice how that dog's bark blends with the silence of the night. You never hear sounds like that in the city. There, were it earlier, you'd hear screeching phonographs or the music of the hurdy-gurdy."

"Give me the hurdy-gurdy, the clang of street-car bells and the noises of the city. You may have this if you want it," restlessly came from Howard. It was on nights like this that he realized how lovely the country was.

"So you'd like to be a city man, would you? Well, you'd soon tire of it. Why, boy, deep in every man's heart is an inherent love of nature. If this is not so, tell me why it is that when Sunday comes, the city man who owns an automobile jumps into it and seeks God's great outside? Or, if he hasn't a machine, he packs his brood of children into a jammed city street car and goes to the discomfort of standing perhaps several hours to get to the country? Why? So that his little children may rejoice in the green of Nature. Is it not so, Miss Colvin? You've lived in the city long enough to know. And didn't you yourself sometimes wish yourself back in the country during some of those sweltering days we had in town last summer?"

Howard watched the girl's face and saw her lips tremble a bit. Ah, could he have seen her mental picture then! For in contrast to this peaceful night, she saw the office in which she labored like a part of a great machine—true, she was well paid for it—where she was not supposed to have a soul, where men considered that she, being in business, must strangle all her finer sensibilities and be even as a man. She saw it all in an instant in all its hurry and relentless grinding.

"You're right, Mr. Stewart. And the more fools we that leave the country of plenty to labor for what? Simply to be city people! And what do we get for it? An occasional evening at the theater, a movie show once a week, and, by dint of hard saving, perhaps a few dollars in the bank. Oh, I get so sick of it!"

"Do you really, Amy?" queried Howard, breathlessly.

"Yes, as sick as you say you are of the farm. But if you go to town, you'll regret it."

"But I shall go, nevertheless," replied Howard.

"Why? Because of the high wages?"

"I can't tell you why with all these people around," he added significantly.

"Then I think we'd all better beat it!" exclaimed Stewart, whereupon he rose and went into the house, followed by Chester and Barbara.

"I want to go because you are there, Amy, but if you'll consent to stay here, I will, too."

"But what excuse can I give for not going back?" queried Amy. "You probably recall how I boasted about my success in town and that I'd never come back."

"You can tell everyone that I want you to stay here; that I love you and want you to be my wife."

"Are you sure, Howard?" Amy asked in a low, serious voice. "Do you really love me?"

"I always have, dear, and it was because you were in town, more than anything else, that I wanted to go there. Listen, dear, shall we choose this harvest?" and he waved his hands toward the shock-stacked fields where the harvest moonlight lay in dazzling refulgence, "or the few dollars which by dint of hard saving, as you say, is the average city man's harvest?"

She looked up in surrender and he caught her to him. She snuggled to his breast. "Of course, it will be Nature's own harvest, dear," she whispered.

Little Wonder Oil Stove

The Only Combination Heating and Cooking Oil Stove on the Market

One gallon of oil is equal to ten in any other oil stove, because it burns 90% air and 10% oil, and instead of 80% of the heat going to waste around sides of kettles, ALL of it is utilized in the fuel-saver top. Boils a quart of water in 3 minutes; makes country cooking as easy as with city gas. Its own oven is a splendid baker; and by using a portable oven on top of this stove, you have the best bread-baker made. Stove sits on top of any range (or will send a stove-height standard for $2.50 extra).

As a heater indoors it is a "little wonder," and pays for itself quick in its saving of coal. Gallon of oil burns 16 to 20 hours. Generated with alcohol, gasoline or kerosene. Why bother with wood or coal or the old-fashioned oil stove that takes forever to get a meal and throws no heat? The only cooker-heater in thousands of homes today.

A written guarantee with every stove.

If your dealer cannot supply you, send money order or check direct to factory and stove will be shipped at once with full directions and guarantee.

Weight 30 lbs. Height 14-in.; cooking surface, with shelves, 16-in. x 24-in.; oven 10-in. x 14-in. x 14-in. Price $17.50 f. o. b. Factory.

Some Important Corners

WHEN I tell you I am going to talk about corners, you will be sure to think I have my mind on elbows. But no, indeed! There are other corners even more important. You may have a sharp-pointed elbow, not at all beautiful to look upon, but you can cover it with the prettiest of sleeves, and even if it is left uncovered the chances are ten to one that nobody will notice it. But the corners I mean can't possibly escape notice! They are the corners of your mouth, and what you do with them has everything in the world to do with whether you look happy or unhappy, pleasant or disagreeable. Yes, sometimes I think it even has something to do with whether you are happy or unhappy.

The corners of the mouth should turn up. Will you keep that in mind? Up! Look at yours at once in the mirror. Do they droop a little, even ever so little? Then get to work at once and begin to train those drooping corners. The best way I know to acquire a beautiful mouth and a lovely expression is to practice smiling inwardly. Involuntarily the corners of the mouth will curve up ever so little, and as they do so the eyes will take on a different expression. I defy anybody's eyes to look sad or unpleasant while the corners of the mouth are curving upward. Upturned corners keep away the suggestion of age, as well, so if you want to keep young, begin right now to train that mouth to curve in the right direction.

A mouth with upturned corners will keep away the deep wrinkles and sagging cheek muscles which come with increasing years. It is difficult for a cheek muscle to sag when the upturned corners of the mouth relieve the cheek of strain. A nervous headache may sometimes be driven away in a short time by the mere mechanical raising of the corners of the mouth. Involuntarily the tightened temples relax, as do other muscles and nerves, and soon the headache is gone. So, for health as well as beauty cultivate the upturned corners.

My girls are always asking me how to make a large mouth small, or a thick mouth dainty, etc. How you hold the mouth may make just the difference between small and large. A large mouth may be made to appear infinitely smaller by the simple method of smiling up at the corners—it shortens the line of the lip; while a thick-lipped mouth looks thinner when upturned corners tighten its fullness a trifle.

And let me whisper something else, girls. If you will practice smiling inwardly and turning up your mouth at the corners, you will find that your disposition as well as your appearance will benefit thereby. You simply can't be cross or impatient while your mouth curves upward, and after you have shown yourself what a difference a smiling mouth makes in your personal appearance you will be very careful about risking your good looks just to be able to say a cross word or two.

So here's to the upturned corners—may all my girls acquire a pair!

Answers to Questions

UNION.—Large pores can be contracted by being careful not to use hot water on the face, except at night before going to bed, and even then the face should be rinsed in warm water afterward, and then in cool, ending with cold water dashed on the skin to close the pores. In the daytime, you should wash the face in tepid water and rinse in cool or cold water. Be sure the face is perfectly clean always before using cold water on the skin, otherwise the pores may contract with dust in them and cause pimples or rough skin. Never wash the face in hot water, then dash cold water on, for the difference in temperature is too great and the skin is apt to chap or roughen; be sure to go from hot water to warm, from warm to tepid, from tepid to cool, and from cool to the final cold dash. Anything you use to take off freckles, such as you mention in your letter, will make the skin sensitive, as freckles are under the skin and to remove them one must remove the outer skin. The new skin left exposed is of course tender and apt to chap, roughen and freckle again. About the eruption on the hands, this is a matter for a doctor's prescription, but in any case you should be careful of your diet, drink plenty of water, and see that the bowels move once or twice a day. You will of course be careful to take a daily body bath, thus keeping the skin free from impurities and giving it every chance to become healthy.

LUVENA L.—I am glad you like the Pretty Girls' Club, and indeed I do feel like a friend to all of you. About those freckles, see what I said just above to "Union." If your freckles are summer freckles, I should let them alone, as they will fade out in the winter; and then I should be very careful of my skin when next spring comes around, wearing big hats, and rubbing in cold cream before going out in the sun. If, however, you are sure your freckles stay all winter long, I should wait until late fall, when there was no more chance of a hot sun, and then would use a freckle remedy on my skin, taking good care of it afterward, keeping it softened with cold cream and protecting it from rough winds. Just a few freckles aren't considered a blemish, and sometimes I think it much better to put up with them than run the risk of making the skin sensitive by using a remover. Bathing the face in buttermilk sometimes removes freckles. While an excellent remover is as follows:

Horseradish Freckle-Remover

One teaspoonful of grated horseradish, one cupful of sour milk. Let the horseradish stand in the milk for six to eight hours, then use the liquid as a wash for the face.

Another good way of removing freckles is to use a small camel's-hair brush, like a tiny paint brush, and touch the spots with the following lotion:

Freckle Lotion

Glycerine, one half ounce; lactic acid, two ounces; rosewater, one fourth ounce.

About dressing your hair, it is somewhat difficult to prescribe a becoming way when I do not know how you look. A good many girls like to part the hair above the ears on both sides, then comb the hair straight down over the ears, carefully turning it under, pinning it firm, then pinning the ends in the middle of the back of the head. The front hair, above the two side parts which were made, is combed back rather loosely, and the ends fastened also low down in the middle of the back of the head. The back hair should have previously been tied with a bit of shoestring close to the head. Now that hair is coiled in a round coil, covering the ends of the other hair and almost at the nape of the neck. The front hair, in being combed back, falls over a little and covers the two side parts, and the hair over the ears is puffed out quite a little. The hair can be fixed in this way with the front hair parted on the side or in the middle, and drawn a little down on the forehead. Indeed, the way to dress hair becomingly is to experiment, and find what suits one's face best. It is never a good plan to comb the hair away from the face steadily for any considerable length of time, as it is apt to make the forehead high. Change your forehead line, your parts, your way of dressing your hair, frequently so that the forehead may not be made too high, parts too wide, or other defects encouraged. Yes, you do not weigh enough for your height, and should try to gain. However, let me whisper that when I was at your age I weighed about the same. Try to get plenty of sleep, at least eight hours, with your windows open, plenty of outdoor exercise, good substantial food three times a day, but not between meals, and be sure to chew your food thoroughly, as well as drink plenty of water.

FLORA.—I am sorry I cannot answer inquiries by mail, but I hope an answer in these columns will help you. The best cure for blackheads is soap and water. That is, blackheads are nothing more or less than dust in the pores which has not been entirely removed and so has hardened and become a blackhead. Get yourself a camel's-hair complexion brush at your druggist's or from some mail-order house, and at night fix a bowl of hot soapy water and with the brush gently scrub your face all over. If you haven't a brush use a Turkish toweling wash cloth. Do not rub soap on the face, then or ever. After your face is thoroughly clean, rinse it many times. Do not use cold water on your face in these nightly baths until you have disposed of the blackheads. When that time comes, always follow your nightly face bath with a douche of cold water to close the pores. Be sure to take a body bath daily, that the pores may be kept open and the body free from impurities. And do not eat too many sweet things.

DOLORFUL B.—The way to have "clear, sparkling eyes" is to have perfect health—there is no other way, my dear. You must keep the body perfectly bathed, the eliminative functions normal, must eat sensible food at mealtime but nothing between meals, get plenty of sleep, outdoor exercise, drink quantities of water, never drink tea or coffee, be careful never to read in poor light—and if you do all these things you may be reasonably sure that your eyes will be clear and sparkling. Rolling the hair on bits of stocking should not break it, unless you roll it too tight to the head and pull it, or unless you are careless in unrolling it. Your hair will improve in color and health as you care better for your entire body. At fourteen, however, the body is undergoing changes and a lot of bodily energy is devoted to those. You need lots of nourishing food, sleep and outdoor air. Let your eyelashes alone—they will improve as you improve your health. The eyebrows may be brushed gently each night or morning with a tiny brush like a baby's toothbrush. Do not use peroxide on your hands and arms. At fourteen the best thing one can do is to let them alone, as they will soon bleach out of themselves. Do not use any tonic on your hair, but be careful about food, etc., as I have prescribed. Then shampoo once in two weeks, and brush the hair gently every night before going to bed, braiding it very loosely. Don't rough your hair, as that breaks it. As to the colors that would be becoming to you, you should be able to wear pale blue, pale green, white, brown (golden brown would be the most becoming) and navy blue. I think you could also wear corn color well. And if your cheeks have a good deal of color you could wear lavender.

INTERESTED SUBSCRIBER.—The best way to get rid of the forehead wrinkles caused from weak eyes is to have the eyes fitted with good glasses and to wear them. Then massage the wrinkles by dipping the fingertips in cold cream and rubbing across the wrinkles, not up and down them. The blackheads and open pores should be cared for as directed in my answer to "Flora" and "Union." Never bring the hair back tight from the forehead, but let it be rather loose. At night the hair should be as loose as possible—in fact, if it is left even unbraided and hanging free it is the best way of all. Your yellow elbow needs daily scrubbing with a complexion or nail brush and good soapy water. A little peroxide in the rinsing water may be applied to the elbow. The dark circles under your eyes may be from some bodily disorder, or from your nerves not being sufficiently strong. See that you get nine or ten hours sleep at night, and that you drink plenty of water. Rest may do away with the black circles—if not, go to a physician and see if there is some other trouble. First, however, try what an extra amount of sleep will do for you.

RECIPE FOR GRAY HAIR.

To half pint of water add 1 oz. Bay Rum, a small box of Barbo Compound, and ¼ oz. of glycerine. Any druggist can put this up or you can mix it at home at very little cost. Apply to the hair twice a week until the desired shade is obtained. It will gradually darken streaked, faded or gray hair and make it soft and glossy. It will not color the scalp, is not sticky or greasy and does not rub off.—Adv.

Danderine is "Beauty-Tonic"

Immediately after a "Danderine" massage, your hair takes on new life, lustre and wondrous beauty, appearing twice as heavy and plentiful, because each hair seems to fluff and thicken.

Don't let your hair stay lifeless, colorless, plain or scraggly. You, too, want lots of long, strong hair, glistening with beauty.

A 35-cent bottle of delightful "Danderine" freshens your scalp, checks dandruff and falling hair. This stimulating "beauty-tonic" gives to thin, dull, fading hair that youthful brightness and abundant thickness. All drug counters sell "Danderine."

How I Make Money —Right at Home!

"LOOK at this check for $26.50—payable to me.

"I made this money easily and pleasantly—in the spare time left over from my housework and the care of Bobby and Anne, my children. In fact, they helped me to make it. I make as much, and often more every month.

"Before I found this new, easy way of making money right at home, in privacy, freedom and comfort, my husband's salary, while sufficient to meet our absolutely necessary expenses, was really not enough to give us any of the little extra pleasures that mean so much to a family. Everything we eat or wear has gone up so high, and salaries haven't kept pace!

"But now we have more than the necessaries—we have beaten the terrible old H. C. of L.—and we have our little luxuries and amusements too.

"How do I do it? Simply by knitting socks. No, not by the slow old process of hand-knitting, which took almost a day for one sock, but by using The Auto Knitter a marvelous, but very simple, easily-operated machine. It turns out fine, seamless wool socks with almost magical speed. Now that I have gained practice with the Auto Knitter I often make a sock in 10 minutes!

"And the best part of it is that I have a guaranteed, constant market for every pair of socks I make, at a guaranteed price. The Auto Knitter Hosiery Company of Buffalo has contracted to take every sock I can make. I simply send them the finished socks, and back comes my check by return mail, together with a new supply of yarn to replace that used in the socks sent them.

"Free Yarn Sent with the Machine and They Pay Me For the Socks"

The Auto Knitter Hosiery Company is an old, firmly established American corporation, engaged in the manufacture of high-grade seamless socks. They have always preferred home manufacture to factory production. They believe in the independent employee, and know from experience that the best work is that done by well-paid, contented people, working in happy homes.

"The Company's world-wide business connections give them an enormous market for socks—everybody, everywhere, needs them—and the company constantly needs more workers to make socks in their own homes. They need you.

"When you decide to become an Auto Knitter worker, as I did, the Auto Knitter Company will make a contract to pay you a fixed Guaranteed Wage, on a piece-work basis. In this contract you take no risk. You can work for them as much as you want, or as little as you want—spare time or full time. And for every shipment of socks you send them you will get your pay check—promptly.

"With the machine they send a supply of wool yarn FREE. They also supply FREE the yarn needed to replace that which you use in making the socks you send to the company.

"The yarn supplied is the well-known Qu-No Quality Brand, made especially for the Auto Knitter. It is the softest, the warmest, the strongest, and uniformity in quality, weight and shade are always obtainable. You receive a Free Shade Card that contains samples of Qu-No Quality Yarns.

"You are, of course, at liberty to dispose of the output of your Auto Knitter as you see fit; you can also use the Auto Knitter to make, at a remarkably low cost, all the hosiery your family needs—wool or cotton.

"But remember this: There are absolutely no strings tied to the Wage Agreement; it is a straight out-and-out Employment Offer at a Fixed Wage on a piece-work basis—a good pay for your services alone."

Better Than a Hundred Hands

THE AUTO KNITTER

A turn of the handle, and 60 and more smooth, even, perfect stitches are knitted. Many of our workers report that, with the Auto Knitter, a complete sock can be made in 10 minutes or less, when the Auto Knitter goes into action it is just like having many families of skilled knitters working for you. It makes the sock—top—body—heel—and toe without removal from the machine. It weighs about 20 pounds, and can be clamped to any ordinary table or stand. Easily learned. Experience in knitting and familiarity with machines are unnecessary. Complete instructions about how to use the Auto Knitter are sent to every worker. The Auto Knitter is to hand-knitting what the sewing machine is to hand-sewing.

Read What Satisfied Workers Say

The Auto Knitter gives you the opportunity to make money during your spare time. It also gives you the chance to devote your entire time to the business, and thus to be independent of bosses, rules, time-clocks, working-hours, etc. The Wage Contract is in no sense a disguised "canvassing scheme," "agency" "or open a store" proposition. Here is the proof—read the evidence from some of our workers.

More Than Two Dozen Pairs a Day

The Auto Knitter has proven very satisfactory. The work done on the machine cannot be surpassed. The only requirement is to learn the work and then work. The Auto Knitter is very speedy and any person of good judgment can knit from one to two dozen pairs of socks a day, and if they want to push the work they can turn out more. The treatment by the Auto Knitter Company is the best, and I have found them to be absolutely reliable. Berlin, N. Y.

Promptness Appreciated

Am sending you today a shipment of half hose. I wish to compliment you on the promptness with which you return replacement yarn and check.

Thanks for Attention

I have just sent you a lot of half hose made by my Auto Knitter with yarn supplied by you. I am glad to avail myself of this opportunity to tell you how much pleased I am with the machine and what pleasure it gives me to work it. I also wish to thank you for the courtesy and prompt attention you have always shown me. Buffalo, N. Y.

A Steady Worker

In this same mail I am sending you 74 pair of half hose. Hope they will reach you all right. Please send replacement yarn, and wages, and I will send another shipment soon.
State College, Pa.

Regular Prompt Pay

I am sending by express three dozen and 9 pair of half hose, being the product of ten pounds of yarn. Please send me 10 pounds of replacement yarn, and wages. Milton, Wis.

Harold's Hallowe'en

HAROLD went to a Hallowe'en party and had a splendid time but on the way there he met with a queer adventure. He was in his father's buggy, all dressed up in his big man suit, with a rose on his coat lapel, a cane in his hand and a derby on his head, when suddenly, the horse took fright at a Jack-o-lantern that hung over the road, and ran away. Harold was thrown out of the seat, but luckily fell upon a pile of long grass and was not hurt. His clothes were torn however, and he was pretty badly scared.

The horse kept running till he was clear out of sight so our little friend found himself alone on a dark, country road.

The Jack-o-lantern that had caused all the trouble seemed to be grinning at him and Harold, throwing a stick at it, shouted:

"Go away you mean old ghost."

To his horror, the Jack-o-lantern seemed to float directly towards him and finally came to rest only a few feet away.

"Please do not blame me," it said, "a boy hung me over the road, and I tried hard not to scare your horse. Any way he is not hurt and will easily find his way home."

"Yes, but how will I get to the party, and who is going to mend my torn clothes?"

"I will take you to an old witch who comes to life on Hallowe'en and she will provide a suit in place of the torn one."

"How can you take me any place?"

"Sit upon me and see."

Harold climbed on top of the pumpkin and it floated into the air like a toy balloon and kept going till it landed him at the side of a large oak tree.

He heard a voice saying, "Knock three times on wood."

Harold struck the tree trunk three times with his knuckles and the Jack-o-lantern disappeared and in its stead stood a little old lady.

"What can I do for you?" she asked.

"I want a suit for a Hallowe'en party," he answered, "if you please." Just then he heard a noise in the tree and looking up saw an immense wild cat about to spring upon him. Shaking with fear, he tried to yell but could not.

"There is nothing to be afraid of, my boy," said the witch, 'this wild cat is going to give you his skin for your party suit."

Our little friend did not quite understand but the old sprite soon made her meaning plain.

Seizing the animal she pulled the hide clear off him as easy as you would peel a banana, but strange to say another furry coat grew on him right away and he scampered along without being hurt a particle.

"Here is your costume," she said to Harold and with deft fingers, soon had him dressed to look like a cat.

"Now," she ordered, "you must walk along the road until you see the farmhouse lighted up and hear the music."

"I am afraid to go alone," he confessed.

"There is no need of that," said the witch, if you see any one on the road or any animal, get down on all fours and they will think you are a big cat and run away."

This reassured him and he started bravely out. Not a soul did he meet except one boy dressed like a clown. Harold got down on his hands and knees and meowed like a cat and the scared clown boy ran screaming to the house where the guests were. Harold followed him closely, and everybody yelled when they saw what they thought was a large wild cat, leap straight into the dining-room. Soon our friend made himself known to the company and then all enjoyed a good laugh. My, but they had a good time playing games after that.

Cut-Out Doll Directions

Paste the whole picture on smooth cardboard and rub with hands from the center towards the edges to press out all wrinkles. Use boiled flour paste. When neatly pasted put it in a big book for at least one day or night to dry. Next cut out each figure, hat and suit with scissors and color them with crayons, chalk or water colors. To put the hats on, cut a slot where the dotted lines are and push them down on the head. The extending flaps are bent back to hold the costumes on. The doll will stand alone if the ends of the strip under it are bent back at right angles.

three months, at the rate of 200 per cent a year) that he promised ought to have aroused suspicion in any sensible person's mind. The proposition appeared to be preposterous on its very face, and anybody should know that legitimate investments even of the speculative class do not pretend or promise anything like such large returns. Nevertheless more than twelve thousand people hold Ponzi's notes for large and small amounts aggregating millions of dollars. Some of them are wealthy or well-to-do and will not be distressed by the losses which now seem inevitable, but with many a one the Ponzi investment represents his or her little all, the loss of which will be a dire calamity. There are millions of suckers in this country who draw money from the savings banks, mortgage their homes or sell their liberty bonds to invest in get-rich-quick schemes which turn out to be fraudulent promotions or financial pipe dreams. Thus, despite the preventive efforts of the Government, the easy marks are swindled out of hundreds of millions of dollars each year.

Strange as it seems, it is a fact that there are many who still have confidence in Ponzi despite the recent disclosures which point to the conclusion that he had no plan of profitable investment but simply used the money of later depositors to pay the holders of earlier notes, and in the face of proof positive confirmed by his reluctant admission that he was convicted of forgery in connection with a swindling scheme in Montreal in 1908 and served a prison sentence of three years therefor, and that subsequently he served a term in the Federal penitentiary at Atlanta, Georgia, for smuggling aliens across the Canadian border in violation of the U. S. immigration laws. These trustful dupes belong to the class known as "once a sucker always a sucker." Don't be a sucker.

he laboriously hammered out his message of love on a piece of rock, or he made a beautiful tablet of clay which reminded you of a headstone in a cemetery and deposited it at the mouth of your cave or the granite arch of your mud hut. He did not put a few postage stamps on it and ask Mr. Burleson to carry it by parcel post. He did not seek to hide his identity by the cowardly methods adopted by those who use our mails. He delivered his missive in a manly manner. He knew that his billet doux would be recognized as a challenge and like a man he waited while you read what he had to say and then he invited you to tread on the tail of his endless prayer chain coat, bedad. Ah, those were happy days. The cave man was quite some in the superstition line, but he had the courage of his convictions, and he did not, like a measly cur, frighten people half to death while hiding behind a miserable two-cent postage stamp. Get after the endless prayer chainers and swat the life out of them. There is enough ignorance and superstition in the land without a recurrence of this particularly loathsome plague.

STAPLES, MINN.

UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am a country boy of sixteen years of age and have read with much interest your articles on Bolshevism. My opinion is this—I do not believe you know what Bolshevism is. The American word for it would mean majority. The Russian people, longing for freedom, overthrew the tyrannical government of the Czar and set up a government of their own under which every man could be his own master and say what he wanted to say. Lenine and Trotzky thought that every man should be equal, that every man should be his own master, raise his own food and manufacture his clothes. They did not believe that men should have modern conveniences such as railroads and factories but all that is changed, they were mistaken. They started to build nationally owned factories and railroads. They have opened their ports to the common goods of the world. They are giving the Russian people more freedom than they ever had before. There are no profiteers as there are in this country who suck the people of all they produce. They believe every man should have an equal share of the wealth he creates. Is this the condition in our own country? GUS ——.

Gus, your letter is a diabolical conglomeration of stupidity, nonsense and downright lies, but it is dope that is very popular in certain sections of our country where people have been fed for years by the foreign and lying sheets with venomous stuff satanically devised to poison the mind of those who get a fat living in this country, and who hate the land that educates and protects them. Of course I do not know what Bolshevism is. If I wanted to know I'd have to go to Chicago, Milwaukee, and scour the hyphenated colonies of the Northwest "alretty yet." You, a child of sixteen, have the audacity to tell a man who has spent his life in study and who knows personally some of the world's greatest evolutionists, revolutionists and radical thinkers that he knows nothing about the hideous thing that is destroying Russia and will destroy you if you for two spare hours

Following is reproduced a chart from page 32, Bulletin No. 22, 1917, of THE UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR which shows the actual cash value of education when it is continued to completion of high school training.

Study this chart carefully—it means money to you

Every Day Spent in School Pays the Child Nine Dollars

Here is the Proof

Uneducated laborers earn on the average $500 per year for forty years, a total of.....$20,000

HIGH SCHOOL GRADUATES earn on the average $1,000 per year for forty years, a total of.....$40,000

This education required 12 years of school of 180 days each, total of 2160 days in school.

If 2160 days at school add $20,000 to the income for life, then each day at school adds $9.02.

The child that stays out of school to earn less than $9.00 a day is losing money—not making money

NOTE — This chart was compiled in 1917, prior to the present high salaries. Today instead of $9.02 it would be between $15.00 and $20.00 a day.

If you have not completed your high school training then do so without delay. Already you have completed a large part of the 12 year work specified by the Government, realize on the work you have done. You can get a thorough, complete high school training in two years time—in your own home—during your spare time. Two hours a day is all you need.

Are you or your children making this extra $9.00 a day or losing it? Why waste money when it's yours for the asking? Write for details today.

Audrey's Recompense

It was like a new world to Audrey.

She blossomed all at once into new beauty—a beauty which caused her fond parents to marvel, and threw the gay world upon which she had flashed like a dazzling star into a flutter of excitement and admiration.

Among their many invitations there was one requesting their attendance at a reception to be given by the Governor of the State, and this was checked for acceptance.

Great care was bestowed upon Audrey's toilet for this occasion—far more care and thought than any one would have deemed possible over a costume so wondrously simple.

It consisted of white lace made over cream-white silk. The silken corsage was made low, and the sleeves short, leaving only the filmy material of the over-dress to protect, though it did not conceal, the pure, white neck and rounded arms of the beautiful girl.

A fairy-like fringe of maiden-hair fern was laid around her shoulders where the corsage of silk ended, thus enhancing the dazzling whiteness of her skin.

Not an ornament gleamed anywhere about her; but her fair, sweet face, with its high-bred features, azure eyes and ruby lips, needed no adornment; while her girlish figure, with its beautiful curves and symmetrical lines, seemed animated with the poetry of motion.

Yet the young girl was so unconscious of her own loveliness and the admiration she excited, that it only enhanced her charms.

"Do tell me who that vision of beauty is."

The request was put to a middle-aged gentleman by a young man of fine appearance, who was standing near when Audrey, with her father and mother, were presented to the Governor and his wife.

He was dark and handsome, possessing a frank, noble face, dark hazel eyes, full of truth and honor, and a gentle, almost feminine, mouth, with its delicately curved lips, but having much of strength and decision in it also.

His gaze was fixed with wondering admiration upon Audrey, as, with girlish grace, she bent a sweeping salute before her host and hostess, and his companion smiled at the deep earnestness of his words.

"Are you, too, going crazy over the new beauty?" he asked, adding: "That is Miss Waldemar, daughter of the Honorable Dudley Waldemar, formerly of this city."

"Do you know them?" was the eager query.

"Yes, well. Dudley Waldemar is an old and highly esteemed friend of mine."

"Will you introduce me?"

"Yes, Arthur; but you must look out and not get your wings singed. All New York is raging over Miss Waldemar, and I see another enthusiast is about to be added to the list."

"Never mind," replied the young man, with a note of impatience in his tone. "I must know her—I must hear her speak. If her voice corresponds with her appearance it must be music indeed."

"Tut, tut, boy; don't get sentimental," laughed the other. "I have always given you credit for being above such fol-de-rol. But come on, if you wish to be introduced; they are moving this way."

Three minutes later Arthur Halstead was bowing before Audrey Waldemar, a strange thrill running through his heart, an unwonted flush upon his cheeks, as her innocent blue eyes met his and he clasped the daintily gloved hand she frankly extended to him.

What need to tell that the "old, sweet story" began over again, then and there? that those frank, hazel eyes made mischief in the heart of the blue-eyed lassie?—mischief that time could never undo. Before they parted that night each soul instinctively knew that it had found its mate.

The fortnight which followed was one never to be forgotten.

Every evening found Arthur Halstead by Audrey Waldemar's side, where, looking into her eyes, listening to her voice, he forgot time, place, everything, save that he was in her presence; while to her he had become a king among men, a hero to honor and revere.

Only two short weeks thus went on, and then they both knew the full meaning of that sweet old story—they loved.

But no word as yet had been spoken to confess it: heart had only spoken to heart—eye to eye.

But it was casually mentioned in Arthur Halstead's hearing one day that Mr. Waldemar and family would leave New York the following week, and with a sudden shock at the announcement, he resolved that he would settle his fate before another day elapsed.

And forthwith he repaired to the hotel where that gentleman was a guest, and in his frank, straightforward way requested a private interview.

It was unhesitatingly granted.

Mr. Waldemar had been much pleased with the young man, and had been in no way disturbed by his marked attentions to his daughter.

He knew that he belonged to an unexceptionable family, his father being a wealthy gentleman residing in a neighboring county, and also had been at one time a United States Senator. He considered the son a young man of brilliant talents and great promise. He knew that his child must choose some day one with whom to spend her life, and why, if her young heart had gone out to him, should it not be Arthur Halstead?

In a manly fashion the young lover made known the object of the interview, and craved permission to win the maiden whom he loved.

"My daughter is very young to enter into an engagement," Mr. Waldemar replied.

"I know it, sir," replied Arthur Halstead. "I will not ask her for that just yet; only grant me your permission to win her love if I can. I—I am sanguine enough to believe that she does not regard me unfavorably."

Mr. Waldemar smiled, for it needed no expert to tell that Audrey's heart had already been won; and feeling that he could offer no reasonable objection to the lover's plea, he gave his hearty consent.

Fair Audrey Waldemar was too pure and true to practice coquetry; and when Arthur Halstead told her with passionate earnestness how he loved her, and begged her to give herself to him to brighten and beautify his life, she simply and trustfully laid her two small hands in his, and trembled with the great joy that had thus come to her.

"We will brighten and beautify each other's life," she murmured, softly; "and you know that I love you, Arthur."

And they both believed they held "the chief of all love's joys, only in knowing that they loved each other."

Mr. Waldemar smiled indulgently when informed of the result of this interview, although he would not consent to a formal engagement just yet.

"Wait," he said, "until Audrey is eighteen and you have attained your majority, which, you tell me, will be in about six months; then, if you are both of the same mind, I will put no obstacle in your way."

The lovers submitted to the probationary decree with a very good grace, happy in the present, hopeful for the future.

They were not to meet under six months, but were to be allowed to write as often as they chose, and when the stated time had passed, Arthur was to join the family, wherever they might be, and their engagement could then be formally announced.

"Six months will seem like an age if I am to be separated from you all that time," the young lover sighed, on the evening before the Waldemars were to depart.

"It will soon pass," Audrey said, cheerfully, "only, I suppose, we must not mope over it, but improve the time as best we can; so let us be patient, for I know that papa thinks he is acting for the best in insisting upon this delay."

So they parted, fondly, trustfully, hopefully.

CHAPTER IV.

"AM I MISLEADING HER?"

When Arthur Halstead arrived at his home he found visitors there—a whole houseful of friends, who had come to spend a few weeks before the family returned to Albany, where they usually spent their winters.

It was the last of October and everything in nature was clothed in its most gorgeous attire; the weather was delightful, everybody in the gayest possible mood, and Arthur received the most enthusiastic welcome from his family and friends.

The visitors consisted of Mrs. Halstead's sister, with her three daughters and young son, and a former intimate friend of Mr. Halstead, Sr., with his wife, two sons, and a lovely daughter.

Augustine Montrose and Richard Halstead had grown up side by side. They had gone to school together, played together year after year, and finally entered and passed through college together. They had always loved each other like brothers, though of late years, business taking Mr. Montrose to a distant portion of the country, they had met very rarely.

Now, however, he had come at a special invitation from his early friend to make a "good, old-fashioned visit."

Ida Montrose, his only daughter, was a lovely, dark-haired, creamy-complexioned girl of nineteen. She had great, lustrous, almond-shaped eyes, the features of a Greek goddess, a mouth that was a scarlet line of beauty, its dreamy smile haunting one with its wondrous sweetness. Every motion of her perfect form was one of grace and elegance.

When she was presented to Arthur there were two in the room who watched with eager eyes to see how they would meet—Mr. Richard Halstead and Augustine Montrose.

"She is beautiful," Arthur said to himself, though adding, with lover-like enthusiasm, "but she will not compare with Audrey."

What Miss Montrose thought of him it was hard at that moment to determine.

She bent one lingering look upon him, gave him her hand with languid grace, and then turned to speak to her mother, who was sitting near.

Several weeks of gayety and pleasure followed, and Arthur found that much was expected of him, as the son of the host, in the matters of entertaining the company and acting as escort upon all occasions; while he was not long in discovering that it seemed to be tacitly understood that Miss Montrose was to be his special care and companion upon every excursion.

He longed to have a private talk with his father, and confide to him the fact of his having formed an attachment for Audrey Waldemar, and that it was his intention to marry her at no distant day; but it seemed he could find no opportunity to do so.

So day after day went by, and he was the almost constant companion of beautiful Ida Montrose; and soon he began to notice the significant glances which were exchanged by different members of that gay household when they were together.

"Can it be possible that they all think I have fallen in love with the fair girl?" he asked himself. "Do my attentions to her savor of that appearance, and am I misleading her in the same way?"

He began to be very much afraid of it as he marked the shy drooping of her lids whenever he addressed her, and the delicate flush which came and went in her creamy cheeks when her eyes chanced to meet his.

"I must put a stop to this at once," said Arthur to himself, greatly distressed; "people must not be allowed to entertain such false ideas, and I will take measures to undeceive them without delay."

That very evening some one proposed that they make up a party, and take a short trip to Florida, before separating to go to their several homes.

The idea was eagerly seized upon, discussed at some length, and finally adopted, and it was arranged that they should start the day but one following.

The party was to comprise Mrs. Copeland, Mrs. Halstead's sister, and her two eldest daughters, Mr. Montrose and family, Mr. and Mrs. Halstead, and Arthur.

But Arthur resolved not to go.

It would be just the opportunity he wished for, to escape from the web which seemed to be closing about him, and he at once intimated that it would not be convenient for him to accompany the party.

A general clamor was instantly raised about his ears.

Everybody protested that he would spoil everything if he remained at home, his father and mother insisted that he must go, and finally, so much having been said, he reluctantly consented to make one of the company.

He resolved, however, to have a talk with his father before starting; tell him everything, and insist that his position be made known in a quiet way, to his friends, and thus avoid all mistakes in the future.

But there was no opportunity. Everybody was full of hurry and bustle, and there was no time for any private conversation with any one.

The party started at the time appointed, and, after a most delightful trip, arrived in St. Augustine just at sunset, one lovely day, and took rooms at one of the principal hotels for a month's sojourn in that ancient town.

And then there began another round of pleasure. Of course there was the usual sightseeing to be done, drives to take, and excursions to make, and it all happened just as Arthur feared; it fell to his lot to be the companion of Ida Montrose wherever they went.

"I cannot help it," he said to himself, "I am as true as steel to Audrey; I can never be compelled to make love to Miss Montrose, and I may as well submit gracefully to this uncomfortable state of affairs. I will treat her as well as I can, in a friendly way, and let things go as they will."

And, having arrived at this conclusion, he strove not to worry about the future.

One day they were to visit a beautiful lake a number of miles from the city. A large party had planned to go; they were to spend the entire day there, and return by moonlight.

Some were to drive, others ride.

Miss Montrose, being an excellent horsewoman, preferred to ride, and, of course, Mr. Halstead was in duty bound to accompany her.

The morning was charming; everybody experienced the most delightful anticipations, and even Arthur himself felt a sense of exhilaration as the horses were brought around to the door, and Ida, more beautiful than he had ever seen her before, involuntarily turned to him and put out her perfectly gloved hands to him for assistance in mounting.

She made a perfect picture, mounted upon her shining chestnut steed, a tremulous smile upon her scarlet lips, a tender, half-conscious light in her wonderful eyes, as she bent slightly forward to receive her whip from Arthur Halstead's hand.

A thrill of pain shot though his heart as he looked upon her, and then caught sight of his own and her father standing upon a balcony above, watching them; and a hot flush mounted to his brow as he saw them turn to each other, speak a few words, and then clasp hands, as if already they were congratulating themselves upon the speedy consummation of their hopes.

"Audrey, Audrey!" his soul cried out, yearningly, as if somehow he felt her slipping away from him, "I am true to you—I shall come for you—I shall never swerve a hair's breadth from my allegiance to you."

The ride to the lake was delightful, the road

Her Two Suitors

gone, thinking what a pleasant thing it would be for this lovely charge of hers to be the mistress of Peak Castle and all its broad domains, not to speak of the vast properties that had so enriched this young man that he could afford to speak slightingly of the inheritance he had received. She knew perfectly well, also, that she would be domiciled in the castle for the rest of her life, and in the twenty years that it had been her home Madam Delpre had learned to cherish the magnificent old place.

"Kenneth Cameron is a singularly handsome man," she said, breaking the silence that had fallen upon her and Dorothy.

"Singularly handsome," agreed the latter.

"The girl who becomes his wife will be a most favored woman. Ah, Dorothy! a quiet nook in the country is all very well for me, but for a young thing like you with all her life ahead of her to be lived, it is quite another matter. There are such beautiful things to be seen in the great world outside, such marvelous things, of which you know so little. And there is society—the great world of kings and queens to be captured, and which would be laid willingly and gladly at the feet of one so lovely as you. I have seen the world, Dorothy, from one end to the other; I have been in the presence of princes, but I have never seen any one so exquisite as you would be gowned in laces and diamonds."

"Oh, madam!"

"It is quite true, child. I know how little vanity you possess, or I should never dare say these things to you. Kenneth Cameron thought as I do!"

"But would he—if he—knew?"

"There is no reason why he should ever know. That chapter is closed. There are very few of us, cherie, who have not something to conceal in our lives. Yours was no disgrace to you, but only those connected with you. You needn't be afraid. Those of your past who would shadow your life are never liable to even hear of you again, and if they should there is no reason for them to desire to injure you, even if they should recognize the name. You are as completely apart from them as if you were on another planet. Keep your secret, Dorothy, and if Kenneth Cameron proposes to you—think well before you refuse him."

Dorothy's eyes were open, looking out into the moonlight, long after she had gone to her room and to bed. For the first time ambition had been fired within the girl. She wanted to see the world! She wanted to be received socially, to know people above the standard of those with whom she had so far come in contact. The hour she had passed with Kenneth Cameron was one which stood out in her life never to be forgotten. He was so gentle so dignified, so refined! Not more so, perhaps, than Rudolph, but Rudolph had been the single exception in all the years that had passed.

Was Kenneth Cameron pleased with her as madam had said?

She remembered the expression of his handsome eyes as he had looked down at her while she sang, remembered now he had pressed her hand at parting. It had been only an hour, but—It would be very delightful to be loved by a great man such as the master of Peak Castle.

She had never looked more exquisitely beautiful than on the following day as she came to the piazza to meet Kenneth Cameron, dressed in a riding-habit that fitted her round, supple figure to perfection. The roses were blooming in her cheeks and the color in Kenneth Cameron's deepened as he arose and pressed the little gauntleted hand she held out to him.

"How good of you to consent to go with me!" he exclaimed. "I was half-afraid you might change your mind, but I see dear madam would not permit you. Madam Delpre, I wonder if you would allow me to take the possession of you that your long residence in the castle would warrant my doing?"

"How do you mean, Mr. Cameron?"

"Suppose I take Miss Griswold there to luncheon with me and you meet us there at two! Please do! You see I am as eager as a boy. The two hours' ride will not be too long for you, will it, Miss Griswold?"

"I almost live in the saddle and never tire."

"Then you will meet us, madam?"

"Yes. It will be very gratifying to lunch at the castle again."

"I am glad of that, for I shall hope to keep you there a great deal! Come, Miss Griswold."

The horses were in front of the piazza, champing nervously at their bits. Cameron's own groom was at their heads. Cameron offered his hand to receive Miss Griswold's foot, and threw her lightly into the saddle. She had scarcely touched it, than she reached her horse's back, as gracefully and airily as a bird. Cameron was enchanted. Purposely he permitted her to ride down the road ahead of him, then he cantered up to her, admiration plainly gleaming in his eyes.

"Who taught you to ride?" he cried. "In all my experience I never saw a woman with so perfect a seat."

She colored deeply, wondering what he would think if she should show him some of the wonders she could perform with that same horse, but answered quietly:

"The gentleman taught me of whom you heard madam speak last night—almost my brother—Rudolph Griswold."

"Oh, yes, I remember, and an artist he is. Shall I have the pleasure of meeting him?"

"I hope so, if you remain at the castle long enough."

He looked at her and laughed.

"I think now my stay there will be indefinite," he said gaily. "Shall I tell you something? When I came to America it seemed an awful bore to me. I only came because I felt that I had swindled your poor Madam Delpre out of the earnings of her lifetime, but now—will it be necessary for me to tell you why I shall not go back for many weeks, Miss Griswold? May I tell you? I have found in America what I never found in any section of the world, though I have searched continent after continent. I have found the woman I—love! Don't be angry with me, please, Miss Griswold! I know that I have no right to tell you that, when I have known you such a short time, but indeed I can't help it! I could no more remain in your presence and not tell you that I love you than I could prevent that love from bubbling through my heart. I think I loved you before I had ever even heard your name, while I stood concealed upon your lawn like a burglar, listening to the exquisite tones of your voice; and then, when I looked into your beautiful eyes, it was hopeless. I may seem impulsive and foolish to you, but I can't help it. If there is no hope for me, I had much better hear it now, in the beginning, though it is already too late. Is there any one else, Miss Griswold?"

The question was put pleadingly, his anxious eyes still striving to see her, though her face was turned farther from him than ever.

Still no answer.

"Have I offended?" he continued entreatingly. "Please answer me. You don't know what the suspense is! I don't ask for your love yet. I know how impossible that would be with a fellow who has so little to recommend him as I have. You couldn't fall in love with me on the spot, as I have with you. I shall be quite content with whatever probation you may put on me, if you will only give me the smallest hope—if you will only tell me that there is no one else who holds your heart or your promise."

Once more he waited, and that time the very small voice reached him.

"There is—no one—else!"

"Miss Griswold—Dorothy! I may call you Dorothy, may I not, when we are quite alone? It is such a quaint, beautiful name, and so suited to you. Oh, I can't tell you how happy even that small concession has made me. It has lifted me straight into heaven. Don't cast me out again. I wish you would tell me that you are not quite indifferent. I wish you would tell me that you would consider being my wife. I know I am not much for such a lovely girl as you to love, and it seems like the very greatest presumption that man was ever guilty of, but 'faint heart never won fair lady,' and if I wait I may lose everything"—humbly. "I have won so much already that I am emboldened. Dorothy, just look at me, won't you, dear? Just let me see what your eyes have to tell me and I will try—I will try to be satisfied."

She was smiling; he knew that by the dimples that were playing about the side of her mouth, which he could see. And then she forced herself to look at him.

It was not a very romantic expression, the one he saw, but there was no discouragement in it. Instead of being satisfied, he seized her hand with the one he could spare from his bridle and carried it to his lips.

"Oh, Dorothy!" he exclaimed rapturously. "It isn't 'no' that I read there. Thank God for that! You are not altogether indifferent, though there isn't the love that I hope to find there one day. How strange it seems that I—Kenneth Cameron, who have wandered all over the world in search of a wife—should find her right here upon my native shores within two days after my arrival. What a happy man you have made me, Dorothy. And how proud I shall be of my own lovely wife. I wonder if you will regret having taken me when you are worshiped by the great world as you will be?"

"But I have not promised yet!" she urged.

He laughed happily.

"Your eyes have not refused me, and that is enough. I shall do the rest. I don't expect that you should love me. That would not be possible yet. But I will win, Dorothy. You have given me the right to your society. You know what it is I am seeking, and I shall find it, dear. I am the happiest man on all the earth. Don't either dampen it or take it from me. Have pity upon me, my beautiful one!"

CHAPTER VII.

AN UNWELCOME GUEST.

There was great excitement over the arrival in America of Kenneth Cameron. Mothers with marriageable daughters made haste to welcome him.

He had more invitations that he could have accepted if it had been his intention of remaining in America for a year, and when it became known that he was to give a ball at the castle, dressmakers were harassed almost to death by the demands that were made upon them and the difficulty of pleasing their captious patrons.

His betrothal to Dorothy had not been announced because she would not have it that a betrothal existed.

"Not until Rudolph has been told," she urged, "and I can't write to him concerning it. We must wait until he comes and has seen you. Then I must tell him myself—not you."

And with that Kenneth Cameron was quite content, for it practically admitted that she recognized the pledge.

She had written, urging Rudolph's presence at the ball, but he had declined, saying that important business detained him, and that he was not intended for balls, anyway, assuring her that he would much prefer having her to himself for the few days that he could remain than attending balls with her, and so while he declined, he did it good-naturedly, sending her a string of pearls to wear which cost him much self-sacrifice.

Dorothy sighed and touched them with her lips when the dainty case lay open upon her knee.

"Dear Rudolph!" she murmured. "I wonder if you will be pleased when you hear the news I have to tell? And I wonder if Kenneth Cameron will ever give me a present which I shall love as dearly as I do these little beautiful things? They mean tears! I wish Rudolph had not given me tears just at this time."

Nevertheless she wore them to the ball—just that simple string about her white throat, round and soft as that of a lovely child.

Her gown was less elaborate than that of the simplest maiden present, and yet none of them could vie with her in beauty.

She was all in white—her half-mourning for Papa demanding that—without any other jewels than the ones Rudolph had sent.

Cameron had provided a magnificent bouquet of white orchids, and nothing could have looked lovelier or more appropriate in her beautiful hands.

She and Madam Delpre were the first to arrive, as madam was to receive Kenneth Cameron's guests, an honor which every woman in the vicinity envied, but one which they yielded was just because of madam's long residence beneath that roof.

He went forward to greet them as they entered, taking both Dorothy's pretty hands and kissing them passionately.

"Isn't she beautiful, madam?" he asked, turning laughingly toward her chaperon, but allowing his enraptured eyes to wander back to Dorothy at once. "I have always considered you the most beautiful woman I ever saw, Dorothy, but you are beyond that tonight."

"Oh, Mr. Cameron, how absurd you are!" laughed Dorothy. "I shall believe by and by that you are simply making sport of me if you are so extravagant. Please let me believe you, and I cannot when you speak like that."

"It is every word Gospel truth, and I have proof of it if you will only take the trouble to look. But, haven't you been able to either persuade or command her to call me 'Kenneth' yet, madam? I thought I had a firmer ally in you than that."

"Not until after Rudolph comes," returned Dorothy, shaking her head at him reprovingly.

"I suppose I shall have to wait then," he said, with a mock sigh; "but I shall be growing horribly jealous of Rudolph if I am always to be put aside like this for his approval of everything. At least I may have your card, may I not? Of course, I shall open the ball with you."

Madam's eyes expressed her delight. What mother could do better for her own child than she had done for Dorothy?

She was enchanted with her success and watched them as she might if her own fate had hung in the balance.

The guests began to arrive after a little and the scene grew exciting.

The place was made for such scenes as that, and Cameron whispered to Dorothy that they would have it filled eternally when she was mistress there.

She observed with pride how he was almost caressed by the haughty dames present, and how charming they were to her after Kenneth Cameron had opened his own ball with her.

There was nothing that Kenneth Cameron had spared to make the affair a success, for it was practically in honor of his betrothed wife, and the truth was noised about that night, in spite of the fact that Dorothy had not permitted it to be proclaimed.

"We understand that we are to congratulate you shortly," one lady said to her sweetly, showing her white teeth in a smile that was not altogether genuine. "The castle is a magnificent property, but it is not the greatest of Mr. Cameron's possessions. It will be a most fortunate thing for any girl."

Dorothy colored. What could she say in reply,

Appealing to Club Women

By Frances L. Garside

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

IF you were asked, "What has made the greatest change in the past five years?" you might reply, "The map of the world."

With reason, but has it made greater change than the character of the women's clubs of the United States?

Kings have tumbled, boundary lines have been moved forward, backward, or perhaps obliterated; prominent personages have sunk into obscurity, and obscure persons have taken their place, all so speedy and so confusing that it has been like watching a game of cards played so rapidly only those engaged in it knew what was happening.

Copyright by Champlain Studios, Inc.

MISS FLORENCE SPENCER.

The change in the character of women's clubs has been just as bewildering. In their influence on the future of this country and the home, they have been just as important. Perhaps more so, for the change has been of a more stable character.

Some years ago women's clubs were for recreation only; bridge, high five, embroidery, gossip, or perhaps the members put out a High Brow sign and went deeply into some ism. It was always something very remote from the needs of the present; Greek art, or Ancient Rome, or the Occult; something that made mother bind up her head with a wet towel while she dipped into the encyclopedia, and father smile behind his hand when he saw her laboriously writing her "paper" to read when her club met.

But what a change these days! The women no longer meet to kill time; they meet to devise ways to best improve it. They discuss politics, prohibition, the industrial situation, health insurance for employees, plans for interesting the girl in sane and safe paths through girlhood; every economic question, public and private, domestic science—oh, the list of things which interests women these days is long and glorious! It is worthy of being printed in illuminated text.

Because women's clubs have changed in character, and are no longer frivolous or uselessly intellectually dull, the Government has fallen into the habit of appealing to them when in need of assistance in some urgent matter. Just now, through Miss Florence Spencer, it is making an appeal to them to check-up in this mad gallop of waste and extravagance into which the nation is plunging.

Miss Spencer is chief of the Women's Division of the Government Loan Organization and also chief of the Children's Division. In her appeal for assistance she is reaching out in three ways: To the women's clubs, to the home circle, and to the child in the school.

She is first vice president of the National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs, and through this position is urging all women club members to join in an organized movement for thrift.

"There is no club in the most remote country hamlet," she says, "that is too small or too remote to be reached. I am in hopes that every woman's club in the country will join us by organizing within its members a Thrift Club, and devote a part, if all is not desired, of the time of its meetings to devising ways for making the family budget afford a savings margin.

"If a woman hears economy in her club, she will practice it at home. She must have a budget; she must keep an account; she must know where every penny goes. That is as much her job as it is of her husband to know where every penny comes from. Home Circle Thrift Clubs will bring all the members of the family closer together. If every evening there is a discussion of the ways and means committee, of which every one in the family is a member, the father gets a kinder vision on what the child wants, the child learns that the father's purse has its limitations, and that it may have a part in making the purse hold more.

"We are interesting the school children. They are saving pennies that formerly went for all-day suckers, toys, ribbons, popcorn, the movies, etc. We find they are reaching through this saving a higher plane of thinking. A library ticket opens greater possibilities than a tin top, and the library ticket costs nothing. The rare visit to the movie is enjoyed more because of its rarity, and the attraction selected with more discrimination.

"The child reached through the school, and the family through the Home Circle Thrift clubs, mean more in the future of this country than one can say, and while both are important, they do not afford the opportunities for learning ways of thrift that may be learned when many women meet and contribute their varied experiences.

"So it is to the club women that I am making my appeal. There are human interest possibilities in a gown to be dyed and made over not found in the lives of early Persian monarchs; there is something to keep alive a sense of humor in a hat to be re-trimmed if all the members of a club made a Hat Day an attraction for a spring meeting; there is the spirit of competition so essential to success if club women vied with each other in the buying of Thrift and Government Savings stamps. Why a prize for making the most points in a silly game of cards, and not a prize for the woman who can show the greatest saving in her household expenditures in the previous month?

"Why be extravagant when there never was a time when there was such urgent need for economy? Why be drunk with a craze for spending when the times demand that every one be sober?

"The Government is placing great hope on the results of this appeal to women. It says that it is through the women the reform must come. As a nation we are famed for extravagance. We must slow down and save as systematically and sanely as we have spent foolishly and wildly, or there will be a bump up against something hard that will hurt every mother's daughter of us, and our children, and our children's children."

The slogan for all women's clubs throughout the nation is "Think Before You Spend."

Give Your Nose a Chance

By Dr. H. M. Smith

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

KEEP yourself free from colds, pneumonia and grippe this winter by giving your nose a chance to perform its functions properly. If you cannot breathe freely through it, if you have an almost constant cold or breathe through your mouth when you sleep, this condition requires attention. You probably are suffering from what used to be called catarrh.

Catarrh is sometimes called the American disease because it is so prevalent in this country, but as a matter of fact catarrh is not a disease at all but a symptom and it is no more common in the United States than it is in Europe, about the only difference being that on the other side of the water they do not call it by that name. In medical practice any unusual amount of discharge from any part of the body is called a catarrh. Thus we have catarrhal disturbances of the stomach, liver, intestines, or any surface that is lined with mucous membrane, but what the average person means when he refers to this disagreeable affliction is nasal catarrh. Doctors tell us that this condition is mainly due to repeated infections, which, in the language of the street, means a succession of colds. Lack of proper care of the nose and throat in childhood will also bring about this condition, so do not neglect the children's cold. Any disease anywhere in the body that lowers its vitality, lowers the resistance of the nose against the attacks of the germs that are responsible for catarrh, for it is the chief duty of the nose to warm and strain free from dust and germs all the air that enters nostrils. Instead of having two straight passages into the head as most people imagine, the nose thrusts out from each of its walls three elastic cushions, one above the other called the turbinated bodies, composed of coils of blood vessels covered with soft mucous membranes. In any emergency these bodies swell up and almost completely close the nostrils. In chronic catarrh they remain constantly about half distended. They cannot expand to bar out a sudden rush of cold air or irritating vapor or contract to allow free passage of pure air into the lungs. Dust and germs that accumulate on the mucous membrane, instead of being washed away, remain until they produce cracks and sores. Breathing through the nose becomes difficult so mouth breathing is resorted to, which sometimes brings on sore throat and hoarseness or deafness or trouble with the ears as well, for the ears are closely connected with the nose and throat by means of the Eustachian tubes. Inflammation will close the mouths of these tubes so that air can no longer be sent up to them to keep the ear drums properly inflated and so the outer side of the drum is pushed in and a sinking or thickening results which is the beginning of deafness. All of which goes to show that a chronic catarrh should not be neglected, but attacked at once by every means in our power for it is not simply a comparatively harmless hang-over from a cold, but an active menace. More than half the causes of deafness or even chronic bronchitis could have been avoided if the nose had only been given proper treatment before the trouble began.

If you want to overcome your tendency to catarrh, the first thing to do is to build up the general health in every way you can by means of a sensible nutritious diet, regular exercise in the fresh air and eight hours of sleep every night in a room with the window open. A mildly antiseptic wash or spray which any druggist can prepare for you, should be used morning and night, but if this does not bring about improvement the nose should be examined by a doctor to see if adenoids or other growths are present or if the turbinated bodies are unduly swollen. Both these conditions can be corrected either by simple operations or proper treatment.

Fall Canning & Cooking

the same process as in canning fruit.

APPLE SYRUP.—To seven gallons of sweet apple cider or juice add five ounces of powdered calcium carbonate (carbonate of lime). Boil the mixture vigorously in preserving kettles for five minutes, and then pour into jars. Let stand eight hours, when it should be perfectly clear. Pour the clear liquid into clean preserving kettles, add one teaspoon of calcium carbonate and stir thoroughly. Boil rapidly until the amount is reduced about one seventh, when it should have the consistency of maple syrup when tested in cold water. Pour into jars and place where it will cool very slowly. When cold, fill fruit jars or bottles and sterilize fifteen minutes in hot bath. Seal. Use on hot cakes, in sauces, cookies and desserts.

APPLE BUTTER.—Make three gallons of apple sauce. Add one quart of cider vinegar and five pounds of brown sugar. Cook slowly on back of stove about ten hours, or until it is thick and of a dark color. There will be about two gallons when done. Just before removing from the fire, season to taste with cinnamon. Frequent stirring while cooking is necessary as fruit butters scorch easily.

PEACH BUTTER.—Pare, pit and slice fifteen pounds of peaches, put in a preserving kettle and bring to a boil in their own juice. Cook forty-five minutes and add five pounds of sugar. Cook fifteen minutes longer, add the juice of one lemon and boil one minute longer. Cook slowly and stir frequently. Put into jars and sterilize ten minutes. Seal.

PLUM BUTTER.—Wash the plums, place them with a little water in a preserving kettle, and cook until soft. Then separate the skins and the pits by rubbing the pulp through a colander or a coarse wire sieve. In the case of large freestone plums it will be easier and quicker to dip the fruit into boiling water a few seconds until the skins crack, then dip in cold water, so that the skins can be readily slipped off, the flesh split open and the pits removed. If the plums are very juicy, the pulp put through a colander will be quite thin and ought to be boiled down to thicken it somewhat before the sugar is added. For each measure of pulp, whether put through the colander or not, use a half to three fourths of a measure of sugar and cook slowly with frequent stirring until the butter is as thick as desired. If a tart butter is favored, less sugar should be used. Cinnamon, allspice and cloves should be added to suit the taste when cooking is finished. Sterilize and seal same as peach butter.

GRAPE CONSERVE.—Squeeze skins from three pounds of grapes and put them through the meat grinder. Cook skins separately in a little water until tender. Heat the pulp in another kettle until the seeds have separated and then strain them out in a colander. Remove the pulp from two large oranges eliminating any fibrous parts and seeds. Grind one-fifth part of one orange peel, also one-half pound of raisins, using fine cutter. Put all together, add one pound and a quarter of sugar and cook about one hour over a slow fire, stirring frequently. Add one-half pound of finely ground pecans and cook five minutes longer. Fill sterilized jelly glasses and when cold cover with a thick layer of hot paraffin. Excellent for school sandwiches.

SPICED PICKLES.—Slice four onions, two large green peppers, and four quarts of green cucumbers. Place in layers in a large dish and sprinkle each layer with a little salt. Over the whole sprinkle one cup of finely grated horseradish. Let it stand for four hours, drain and put into preserving kettle with one quart of apple vinegar, one cup of brown sugar, one teaspoon each of powdered cloves, tumeric powder and white mustard seeds, and two teaspoons of celery seed. After it begins to boil, cook twenty minutes.

APPLE ROLL.—Chop one-third cup of lard into one and one-half cup of flour mixed with one teaspoon of salt. Wet with cold water until it is right to roll. Without kneading, cover and set in a cold place until the next day. Roll into a thin sheet, and spread with four fairly tart sliced apples, top with one-half cup of sugar, one-half teaspoon of mixed nutmeg and cinnamon and one rounding tablespoon of butter cut into bits. Roll, put into a long tin and bake one hour.

SOUR-MILK CORN BREAD.—Beat hard until smooth two cups of corn-meal, two cups of sour milk, two tablespoons of butter, two tablespoons of sugar and one fairly rounding teaspoon of salt. Cook in a double boiler ten minutes. When cool, add two eggs well beaten and one teaspoon of soda dissolved in one tablespoon of water. Bake half an hour in a hot oven. If there is not time to cook the mixture in the double boiler, put all the dry ingredients together, beat the eggs well, add the sour milk to the eggs and beat again and add to the drys. Omit water. Bake in a shallow pan.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

fourteen. They read COMFORT and enjoy it as much as I do. I began taking COMFORT when it was only ten cents per year but I think it is well worth the price charged for it now and I had much rather have it than other high-priced magazines.

Now I will tell you something of myself and surroundings. I have two children and a dear good husband. We are both thirty-nine years old, but I guess I look older than my husband for I have been sick so much. I weigh only 95 pounds. I don't give up and go to bed very often but this is one time I had to. I am thankful that I am able to keep things going most of the time and I love to work among my pretty White Leghorn chickens. We came to San Antonio nine years ago and I fell in love with the place then. Everyone is sociable and ready to help in time of trouble. The climate is fine too, although it is changing and we have much more rain now than when we first came. San Antonio is a growing city and is being made more beautiful every year. There are many tourists here. People come a long ways to see our dear old Alamo. There are several of the old missions still standing. We have beautiful parks, the largest being Brackewridge Park. The river winds in and out and there are many rustic bridges, sunken gardens laid out with lovely flowers, with thousands of lights that make it bright at night. Then there are all kinds of wild animals and birds; in fact, everything is there that it takes to make a park attractive.

I'll join in regards to Uncle Charlie and wishing him happiness and success. I enclose thirty cents, ten cents apiece from my children and me.

Love to Mrs. Wilkinson and the sisters.

MRS. NELLIE MATHIS.

Mrs. Mathis.—It will be a pleasure for me to show your letter to Cousin Marion, even though I do not know her so very well, and I am sure your appreciation of her work will make her very happy. And now just a word to you, little woman. Don't be so proud of the fact that you never give up and go to bed when you are sick. I knew a woman once who felt that way but she isn't living now.—Ed.

CAPE GIRARDAU, MO.

MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

But few men, so far, have invaded the Sisters' Corner. I expect that I will be welcome for I have come to champion the old maids. Who am I that I should be so bold? Oh, nobody in particular, but you've all heard of male egotism.

I read the letter from "Three Butterflies," in July COMFORT with disgust. In the first place men, real men don't want butterflies or cooks or housekeepers nor do they want someone to protect. What they want and what hundreds of clean, decent men are searching for, are pals and companions. They are right in accusing old maids of being self reliant and sensible. The poor, painted, bepowdered, peroxided butterflies that one sees on the streets would never be accused of being either. I have read somewhere that an oak encumbered with a clinging vine is invariably dead at the top; but the poor specimens of manhood who want someone to protect are usually in need of protection themselves. I know some of them myself, poor, pale, emaciated apologies for men who, nevertheless, think that men were meant to protect and rule women. Heaven help the women! But to get back to the old maids; they are the most abused class on earth. Thoughtless creatures like the butterflies, judging others by themselves, think that they are crazy to marry any man who will have them. The fact is old maids want to marry but they are hard to please. They want clean men who are their equals and the tragedy of life is that although there are many decent men and decent women, they so seldom meet.

BASHFUL YOUNG MAN.

CREAL SPRINGS, ILL.

DEAR COMFORT READERS:

How nice and comfortable this corner is. I certainly think this paper deserves its name.

Three Butterflies, I agree with you. I have seen girls of eighteen mope around as though they were forty years old and they were always slighted in society and often wondered why. You were asking for a new method of collecting money to pay for your Victrola. Well then, listen to this: Give a shadow social. It is more fun than hard-time socials or box suppers. Do as follows:

Make a stage. Cover the opening with a large white sheet stretched so as to make a screen, with plenty of room behind it. Over this screen hang a dark, black or green curtain so that it can be drawn back when the social starts. Have all the girls bring baskets of food as for box suppers, and when all are seated in front of the curtain have the lights turned out with the exception of a strong light behind the curtain. The girls bringing boxes of food will, one by one, appear between the light and the screen, thus making a lovely shadow which is revealed as the dark curtain is pulled back. The men bid on these shadows instead of the boxes and then eat supper with the "shadow." The girls could be dressed as clowns, fairies, Scotch Highlanders, Indian princesses, etc.

Love to all.

FLORA CARR.

Flora.—Now I know that forty is the age when people are old and begin to mope around, because Flora says so. Dear, dear, and I've always regarded forty as almost young. Thanks for the shadow-social idea. I wish more of the readers would send in suggestions for socials and entertainments.—Ed.

BYNUM, TEXAS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

So many mothers are sending their babies' pictures to dear old COMFORT that I wonder if you would print my baby boy, too?

He was ten months old when the photograph was taken and I think you will all agree with me that he is very sweet. One dear old lady told me he would be pretty if he just had some clothes. However, he wears them once in a while. His name is Aristo.

I hope to raise him to be a true and noble boy and to live my life before him so that when he grows to manhood he need never blush over a single deed of mine.

ARISTO LANDERS.

I read a lot and also do considerable fancy work and sewing and earn my pin money that way. I try to be busy at something all the time as I have found from experience that work will kill time and trouble better than anything else on the market.

Will come again some time if baby and I are welcome this time.

MRS. NINA LANDERS.

Mrs. Landers.—Clothes or no clothes, little Aristo is a darling baby and I know just how proud you are of him.—Ed.

ON KANSAS TRAILS.

HELLO THERE EVERYBODY:

Enclosed you will not find that picture of me as I didn't enclose it. I only looked "so so" anyway and now I look "more so" for since I "flu" I've lost all my hair and if you will imagine a peeled onion balanced on a six foot pole you won't need the picture.

We are living out in the fresh air again for a few weeks and, of course, you want to hear about it.

We left Kimball, S. Dak., June 3rd and arrived in Kansas the 19th, making a record trip, and the big black team enjoyed it as much as we did. We have fish poles, saddle pony, camera, hammock and a box of magazines along—also a bird. We picked him up in the country where someone had lost him from a box and he took to camp life right away. I rather enjoy being an old hen; I am getting so I can cluck perfectly and have stepped on him only twice. I think he is a White Rock.

Yesterday we came to a nice place to camp, among some peach trees, and as another man and team were needed, Mr. Vesey hired out to thresh—threshing is in full swing in July in Kansas.

Now for the news!! A man tore his trousers and I sewed 'em for him. He is about five feet, ten inches tall, sandy complexioned, well traveled, sharp eyed and a man one would choose for a friend. Can I keep a secret? I'll make you guess his name. He told Daddy that he wrote to our Corner and signed himself "Bachelor Bill." He hasn't even a wart on his nose for us to make fun of so we may as well decide to like him as he is. I found out that he has a mother whom he loves dearly, and that he also likes cats and other pets. I'm not certain whether he likes bachelor girls, but he calls 'em "old maids" and he doesn't look cross when he says it. In fact, I don't believe he could get real cross, though he might try to appear dignified or stern on occasions.

Isn't the world small?

Being a COMFORT sister is like belonging to some great lodge and when we camp near people who read COMFORT—most of them do—and they find out my name it is difficult to get away and when we do start they ride a mile or so with us, and COMFORT has added a few more friends to our list.

Roads, weather, camp grounds, scenery, people and our health were fine all the way through. I liked the big river crossings best of all. We came over the Missouri at Running Water, S. Dak. on a gasolene ferry boat. The river is very wide there and the high overhanging rocks on the north shore were covered with birds' nests and hundreds of little eyes were peeping out.

If any of you find a fat Collie dog near Downs, Kansas,—a dog that wags both ends when you call her Gyp—please put her out of her misery for she will never be quite contented without the kiddies. We lost her or she lost us, or she may have been stolen but I think she was out after prairie dogs or rabbits.

I am watching the pretty things along the way that I may copy them when I have a "homesick" again; the window boxes, hanging baskets, arches, vine arrangements, gates, etc. Some very beautiful places are spoiled by an untrimmed tree, roadside weed patch,

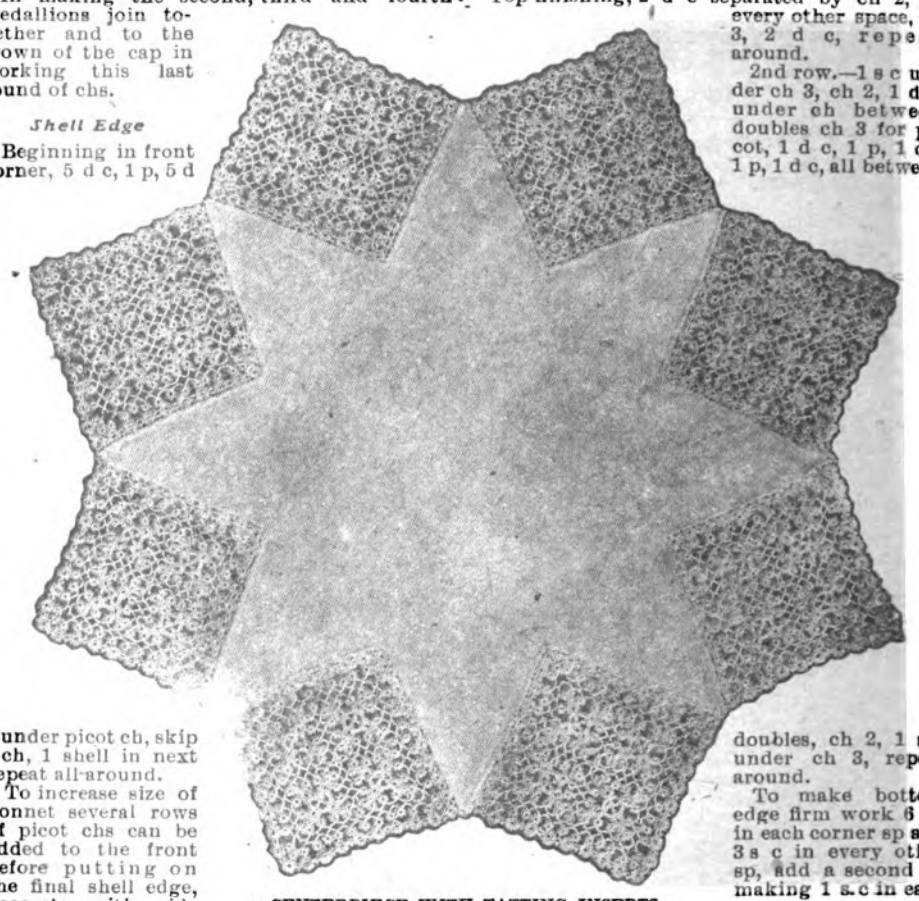
Make a round of 18 of these rings joining the last to the first. 2 picot chs over each ring and 1 between each ring. Next three rows picot chs joining to chs in previous row.

INFANT'S CAP IN IRISH CROCHET.

Medallions for Front of Hood



Make four medallions working as directed for rose in center of crown making 3 rounds of petals in each rose, then six leaves with six rings between. The next round is all p chs with 1 shell over the second ring, 1 shell over the 3rd leaf, 1 shell over the 4th ring and one over the 6th leaf, make 1 more round all of picot chs and break thread and fasten.

In making the second, third and fourth medallions join together and to the crown of the cap in working this last round of chs.

Shell Edge

Beginning in front corner, 5 d c, 1 p, 5 d c under picot ch, skip 1 ch, 1 shell in next repeat all around.

To increase size of bonnet several rows of picot chs can be added to the front before putting on the final shell edge, decorate with side rosettes or ribbon trimming across the front as shown in our illustration.

Child's Filet Crochet Yoke

BY CYNTHIA LOOMER

Ch 48 sts, turn.

1st row.—1 d c in 9th st from ch, ch 2, skip 2 1 d c, repeat making 14 sps in all, ch 5, turn.

2nd row.—14 sps, ch 5, turn.

3rd row.—6 sps, 7 d c on 2 blocks over next 2 sps, 6 sps, ch 5, turn.

4th row.—3 sps, 2 blks, 1 sp, 2 blks, 1 sp, 2 blks 3 sps, ch 5, turn.

5th row.—3 sps, 8 blks, 3 sps, ch 5, turn.

6th row.—4 sps, 2 blks, 2 sps, 2 blks, 4 sps, ch 5, turn.

7th row.—2 sps, 3 blks, 1 sp, 2 blks, 1 sp, 3 blks, 2 sps, ch 5, turn.

8th row.—Same as 7th row.

9th row.—Same as 6th row.

10th row.—Same as 5th row.

11th row.—Same as 4th row.

12th row.—Same as 3rd row.

Next 2 rows all sps. This makes the square or block shown on the shoulder.

Next ch 48 sts, turn, 14 sps, on ch and 6 sps over sps on first blk, ch 5, turn, 20 sps, ch 5, turn, 6 sps, 2 blks, 11 sps, ch 5, turn, 8 sps, 2 blks, 1 sp, 2 blks, 1 sp, 2 blks, 3 sps, ch 5, turn, one continues to copy the design worked in center of first blk, keeping the lower edge even and on the neck edge turning with a ch 5, as directed so as to lessen this side by one blk.

After completing design make 2 rows all sps, then ch 48 sps for the front, turn.

1st row.—Front 14 sps on ch, 13 sps over sps, ch 5, turn.

2nd row.—27 sps, ch 5, turn.

3rd row.—6 sps, 2 blks, 18 sps, ch 5, turn.

4th row.—15 sps, 2 blks, 1 sp, 2 blks, 1 sp, 2 blks, 3 sps ch 5, turn.

5th row.—3 sps, 8 blks, 14 sps, ch 5, turn.

6th row.—15 sps, 2 blks, 2 sps, 2 blks, 4 sps, ch 5, turn.

7th row.—2 sps, 3 blks, 1 sp, 2 blks, 1 sp, 3 blks, 12 sps, ch 5, turn.

8th row.—12 sps, 3 blks, 1 sp, 2 blks, 1 sp, 3 blks, 2 sps, ch 5, turn.

9th row.—4 sps, 2 blks, 2 sps, 2 blks, 13 sps, ch 5, turn.

10th row.—12 sps, 8 blks, 3 sps, ch 5, turn.

11th row.—3 sps, 2 blks, 1 sp, 2 blks, 1 sp, 2 blks, 11 sps, ch 5, turn.

12th row.—14 sps, 2 blks, 6 sps, ch 5, turn.

Next 2 rows of sps, repeat design lessening 1 sp on neck edge until one reaches a width of 16 sps (counting spaces and blks) after making 2 rows of sps in center of the front, increase by adding 1 space at a time to the neck edge to correspond with decreasing.

After completing 4 designs for the front, stop working over 14 sps from the lower edge. After completing side design at the neck edge add a ch 29 sts, turn, 8 sps on ch, 6 sps over sps, ch 5, turn, 1 row 14 sps. Repeat design for shoulder. Break thread. Join to end of ch 29 and ch 48 sts, now make side design, 4 center designs and a side design as before, thus making front and back exactly alike.

Top finishing, 2 d c separated by ch 2, in every other space, ch 3, 2 d c, repeat around.

2nd row.—1 s c under ch 3, ch 2, 1 d c under ch between doubles ch 3 for picot, 1 d c, 1 p, 1 d c 1 p, 1 d c, all between doubles, ch 2, 1 s c under ch 3, repeat around.

To make bottom edge firm work 6 s c in each corner sp and 3 s c in every other sp, add a second by making 1 s c in each s c.

Tatted Circular Yoke

BY THEO RICHARDSON

Materials: One shuttle, one ball white and one pink mercerized crochet cotton No. 30.

The center of the yoke consists of wheel motifs made as follows; using white make ring 2 d s, 1 p, 2 d s, 1 p, 2 d s, 1 p, 2 d s, 1 p, 2 d s, close.

With 2 threads make pink chain 2 d s, 1 p, repeat making 1 picot in all, 2 d s, 1 ring, joining fourth p to second p of first ring. Repeat rings and chains until one has 9 of each, join and cut thread.

DOILY IN RELIEF CROCHET.

In making second wheel join center p of sixth ch to center p of first ch in first wheel.

For yoke for medium size person 20 wheels will be sufficient. Join first to last wheel.

With white make a ring of 9 p with 2 d s, between, join third p to center p of above chains which join wheels, join sixth p to center p of corresponding ch on next wheel, make 3 more picots, 2 d s, close ring and cut thread.

Fit rings in between the wheels on both sides in this way.

Bottom Finish

With white make rings 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, join to first p of white ring between wheels, 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, close. Leave thread about one-quarter inch or long enough so as not to draw in bottom of yoke, 1 ring joining first p to last p of first ring, second p to last p of white ring between wheels, 1 ring joined to second ring, 1 ring, joining second p to center p of first free pink chain, 1 ring, 1 ring joining to center p of next pink ch, 1 ring, next 2 rings joined as before to white ring between wheels. Repeat all around.

Top Finish

With white make ring 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, join to 1 of white ring between wheels 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, close, with pink make ch 2 d s, 4 p, 2 d s, 1 ring, joining to first ring, 1 ch, 1 ring joining to pink ch of wheel, and last ring. Repeat around.

Child's Band

For the child with outstanding ears and to be worn during sleeping hours, use frilled on shirred elastic one and one-fourth inches wide. Measure around head starting at center of forehead, over upper part of ear and back of head. Care should be taken not to get band too tight. Lap ends and fasten. Cover lap with loops of inch-wide ribbon.

Knitted Striped Bedspread

BY BERTHA ENGLUND

For a bedspread about 70 inches wide use No. 10 knitting cotton, No. 4 needles.

For a strip cast on 365 stitches.

1st row.—Purl to end.

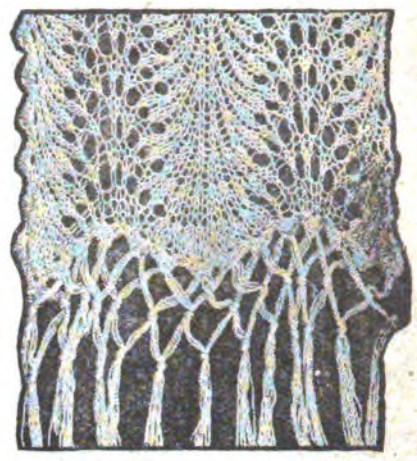
2nd row.—Knit plain.

3rd row.—Purl.

4th row.—K 2 tog, repeat 4 times, * throw thread over needle, k 1, repeat 8 times, k 2 tog 8 times.

Repeat from * making half strip on edge or k 2 tog and repeat only 4 times, same as in beginning of this row.

Now repeat pattern from 1st row until the length desired.



Then bind off. Fringe bottom and to make other edge firm finish with 1 row single crochet.

Doily in Relief Crochet

BY ELLA DAVIS

Use No. 40 cotton.

Cut a piece of linen octagon shape and finish the edge with one row of single crochet.

KNITTED STRIPED BEDSPREAD.

Each of the eight sides of the pattern illustrated measures about five inches and a pattern of alternate grapes and leaves is arranged as shown. The row around doily is of trebles with ch 3 between on each turn or corner making the trebles in every other stitch to give the necessary fullness.

For Group of Three Leaves

Use No. 40 cotton.

Ch 15 1 s c in each st, 3 s c in end st, 1 s c in each st down opposite side of ch, ch 3, 1 s c in each s c on first side working always through further loop of each st only, 3 s c in center st on point, 1 s c, in each s c down opposite side ch 3, 3 s c under ch 3, 1 s c on each s c to within 3 sts of the point, ch 1, turn 1 s c on each s c, 3 s c under ch 3, ch 3, 3 s c under ch 3, 1 s c on each s c, turn as on opposite side and work back. Continue in this way until one has 7 chains through the center, work from point to center of 7th ch and finish off. Join leaves by sewing together.

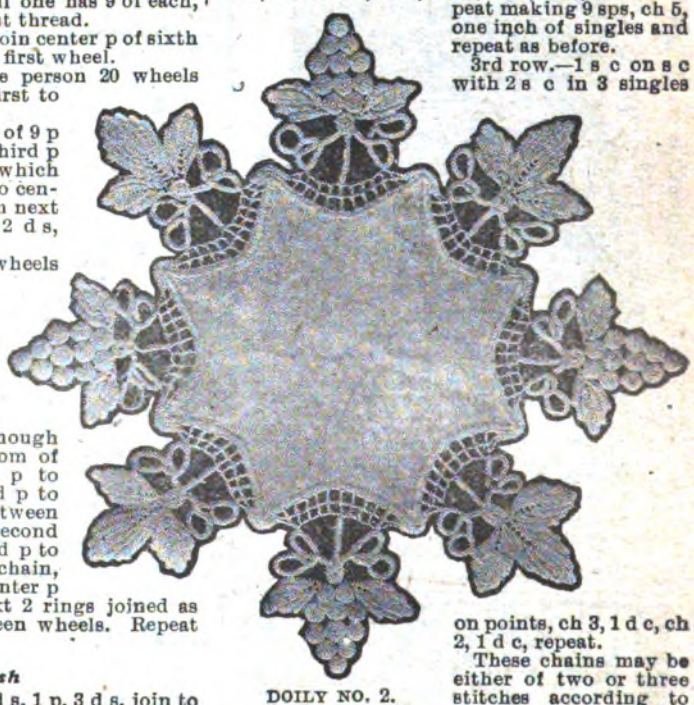
For Leaves and Grapes

Make leaves in the same way. For grapes ch 3, join in ring fill with singles, then work round and round making 2 s c in 1st as is necessary to keep work flat, until grapes are about the size of a cent, join as they are made or sew together.

For Stems

Make ch and cover with singles arranging in two loops joined to leaves.

Sew these motifs in place to the edge of work around the center.



Doily No. 2

Cut a piece of linen octagon shape, and the curve in each of the 8 sides, finish with 1 round of single crochet.

2nd round.—From a point s c for one half inch, then ch 5, sk 5, 1 d c, ch 3, sk 5, 1 d c repeat making 9 sps, ch 5, one inch of singles and repeat as before.

3rd row.—1 s c on s c with 2 s c in 3 singles on points, ch 3, 1 d c, ch 2, 1 d c, repeat.

These chains may be either of two or three stitches according to how one works, they should not be short enough however to pucker the linen.

DOILY NO. 2.

To Perfume Lingerie

If you want the most delicate odor of violets to pervade handkerchiefs, collars and waists use a little orris root when laundering. A small piece can be added to the clear water in which they are boiled.

Trappers of Marsh and Hill

By Richard K. Wood

CHAPTER I.

CAMP AND TRAP LINE PREPARATION.

IT was a sunny day up New York State the first of November, when young Bill Sively and his companion, Roger Bailey, hauled in the last load of corn, which ended the fall harvesting on the Sively Farm. The potatoes had been dug, marsh hay hauled in and every preparation made for the long winter days.

"Now, Roger, in the morning we can load our duffle in the buckboard and beat it to Sugar Hill camp. It's the trail and trap line for us hereafter. You know, Pa said yesterday after the corn was gathered we could go for the winter. He's already hired a man to do chores. Hooray!" and the elated young farmer-trapper tossed his hat high into the air, making an effort to catch it on his head. Roger showed his delight by whipping the horses to a trot through the rocky field.

Bill and Roger had been chums all their life, of neighborship "up-state." They had fished, hunted, trapped, played and occasionally fought together for a dozen years. Lastly, they had "got through" the local public school together, finishing their studies with credit. Now, with a year of intermission they were planning on entering a "down-state" college together. Being raised on a farm and each only one in a large family, it was necessary for them to at least partly provide their own means to get collegiate expenses. Their parents had agreed to share "crop money" with them provided they secured an equal amount by their own sole efforts. This amount they had elected to get by trapping and hunting the fur bearers indigenous to the marshes and hills of St. Lawrence County.

With these plans in view they had at leisure time during the summer repaired a sugar-grove camp for fall trapping and built an entirely new camp in the foothills of the Adirondacks, close to the haunts of semi-wilderness animals. For several months they had planned trap lines, invested money in equipment and studied the trappers' guides issued by fur houses. Traps of the latest designs had been ordered, a new rifle purchased and other necessary accessories acquired by divers means.

THE DUFFLE WAS UNLOADED AND STORED IN THE CAMP.

* * * * * *

The sun shone bright on an auburn and sear farm land. Overhead, ducks and geese were honking their way southward. On the ground was thickly spread a carpet of brown and red leaves, soon to be pinned secure by blankets of snow. Along the old stone fences red squirrels were scurrying with jaws crammed full of nuts, eager to cache them in crevices for winter use. Once a brown weasel, with tail black-tipped and fur in the process of changing to its customary winter white, glided from under an old barn and darted for the stone wall. Its fur glistened in the weak morning sunlight with a healthy radiance common to all farm-fed fur bearers.

The weasel had reached the protecting shelter of the stone fence and turned to glance back when a bullet from a 22 rifle spatted close to its head. With chain-lightning rapidity it disappeared and a disappointed young hunter went his way.

"I saw a weasel this morning, Roger, and it was nearly white. That means that furs are soon going to be fully prime. They are now being quoted by New York and St. Louis fur houses at prices never attained heretofore. Yes, shot at the weasel but scored a miss—that's nothing, just one more to trap when its fur is entirely white," Bill exclaimed the morning of their leave for camp.

At the Bailey farm, adjoining Sively's, there was much hustle and boisterous talking as two young lads crammed loose odds and ends of camping paraphernalia into an already overcrowded one-horse wagon. Bedding, a cook stove, axes and a saw, provisions, traps and fur-stretching boards sufficient for a two-months' trapping trip, filled the buckboard to overflowing. By an hour of sun, the boys bid their parents good by and started on the twenty-mile drive to the Sugar Hill camp, near the St. Lawrence River marshes. A younger brother of Bill's accompanied them to drive the horse back home.

The journey was made without mishap or incident worth mentioning, except that Bill, the more skilled of the two as a hunter, left the wagon within a mile of camp to take a "short-cut" through the fields in search of a bunny for supper. He carried a light double-barrel, sixteen-gauge shotgun, and was fortunate enough to pepper a cottontail with number six chilled shot before reaching camp.

The camp was found in good shape, except for the nests of a few peewits clinging to the rafters. The boys had not even overlooked a broom, which was obviously useful in sweeping the floored end of the camp. The other end had a ground floor and was used as a "wood-pile." A door opened into the woodshed.

The duffle was unloaded and stored in the camp. A few cross words were necessary to get the stove set up and pipe properly installed, but this finished, things got down to a smooth routine of camp duties. Bill contracted to do the cooking while Roger gathered wood and brought water from a nearby spring branch.

Spuds and meat brought from the farm were prepared for supper, which were keenly enjoyed amid much joshing about the cook. After the tin dishes were washed and dried, the boys gathered around the stove and discussed trapping subjects. Bill had brought a copy of the game laws, and this was read over carefully to acquaint themselves with any new laws or changes in old ones. They did not want to violate the game laws, knowing their purpose is calculated to benefit the trapper and hunter in particular and the country in general.

"It's now just one week until the trapping season opens," exclaimed Bill, who did most of the initiative work, "and we are not here a day too early. There's trap lines to be laid out, dens, haunts and trails of fur bearers to look up, some more boards to make, perchance, and a two months' supply of wood to cut. We can't afford to stop during the best of the trapping season to do work that might have been done beforehand. If signs are good, the chances are we will be busy from daylight till dark tending traps and stretching the furs.

Daylight the next day found the two boys at downright hard work, sawing dead wood and splitting it into sticks of suitable size for the camp stove. They had secured permission from the landowner to cut any dead timber near camp, the falling of which was a protection to the camp. It was hard labor, the sawing and splitting of knotty trees, but the boys worked like beavers, pleased to see their woodpile increase in size. Never had they worked so industriously on the farm, but then there wasn't such an obvious inducement held out. An hour of sundown each day they quit sawing to stack their wood under the shed. When the shed was filled they stacked several cords just outside in easy reach of the door.

Three days of wood gathering made a big showing, indeed several cords were accumulated, so that the boys decided to quit and devote the rest of the week to prospecting for fur signs and laying out trap lines.

Directly in front of the camp was a stream, the natural runway of mink, raccoon and muskrats. Its fountain was near a marsh on the St. Lawrence River and six miles below camp it emptied into an inland lake. For at least a mile above the mouth of the creek was a marsh inhabited by muskrats galore; so there was a marsh at each end of the stream. The boys agreed to each taking an end of the stream, running a long circle line from camp in each direction, first along the stream for water animals and back through the sand hills for skunks.

Never were there two more highly elated boys than Bill and Roger, the morning they started out from camp on the fur prospecting trip. Each carried a small rifle, belt, axe, knapsack and lunch, prepared to spend the day by stream and in the woods. The boys parted near the camp, one going up stream and the other down, each to look up his own trapping grounds.

Here and there the young trappers stopped to closely inspect the bank of the stream near the water's edge, where numerous tracks indicated the presence of fur bearers. Sets of tracks with a tail mark between were readily recognized as those of the muskrat, for it is the only small fur animal that drags its tail in the mud. Drifts and stumps leaning over the banks were examined carefully for signs of mink and 'coon. Where the banks sloped rather abruptly into the water, the boys dug holes into the bank, beginning at the water level and continuing upward until the back end was high and dry and a foot from the water. Later the young trappers intended to bait these holes with fish to attract the mink and 'coon. Being accustomed to finding a "free lunch" at these natural appearing holes, the slyest fur bearers would be totally off their guard when the traps were properly set.

In the marshes the boys waded around in their hip rubber boots, hunting runways and counting muskrat houses. In this way they estimated closely the number of traps necessary to properly guard a certain piece of marsh.

Bill had taken the lower end of the stream, for at this end it had been calculated there rested greater responsibility and Bill was the more experienced trapper. While fur returns were to be divided equally at the end of the trip, the boys had planned to each assume duties at which he was most proficient. So it fell to the lot of Bill to select the best trapping grounds and devote most of his day to trapping; while Roger, not so expert at the keen art of luring animals to their untimely end, was to take a short line and return to camp in time to skin and stretch the previous day's fur catch and prepare supper on the little box stove.

Roger got back to camp by the middle of the afternoon, highly pleased with his prospects for trapping. He had come back through Cedar Hills, almost every sand-knoll of which harbored a skunk family. However eager he was to impart his discovery to his partner, he was even more interested in hearing Bill's report on the lower end. The marsh around the mouth of Whitehouse Brook, as their trapping stream was called, had been considered the best trapping section in the county.

Bill opportunely stepped into camp as the baked beans were done to a Boston brown and set upon the goods box table by his helpful partner. He did not wear his customary smile and Roger immediately sensed something wrong. He sat down to the improvised table and sipped tea without speaking and the cook followed suit.

"Well, how's prospects," Roger's impatience at last gave in.

"'Fair to middlin',' as Hank Dunker says, except the lower marsh has been poached. There are traps in there now, half a hundred, or so, and they've been there a week or longer. Whoever set them used a boat to cover his deeds. Tomorrow morning we'll be waiting at daylight to meet the outlaw, and he'll vacate immediately or take the consequences of unlawful trapping."

The young trappers retired to their bunks having decided to get up in time to be down at the lower marsh early the following morning to meet the "out-of-season" trapper.

The Garden in October

THIS is the season of the year when sweet herbs are sold. Such crops include thyme, marjoram, sage and summer savory. They are grown to good advantage and profit in market gardens around New York and might well be made a feature of such gardening elsewhere. Some of the growers receive $400 or more per acre for such crops; or used to do so. Today the prices may be a bit higher, but we have no information as to that at this writing. The plants are certain of a sale if in the green state. They are shipped in open crates, so arranged by divisions of slats that not more than eight or nine inches of a layer come together. So packed, they can, according to Peter Henderson, be shipped in cool weather distances requiring 50 to 60 hours in transit. Cut out only every alternate row, as it gives the crop time to grow, so that the remaining rows spread sufficiently to fill the space.

Crops planted in September must now be kept clean by constant hoeing. Chickweed, so much relished by canaries, now is plentiful and a nuisance. It should be fought by every known method, for it is a bad and expensive enemy. Lettuce, cauliflower and cabbage plants may now be pricked out in the cold frames. The sash should face south or southwest. Shelter from the northwest is necessary. Let it be a board fence six feet high, if that can be managed. Keep the plants hardy; not spindly things by forcing and too much heat and covering. They will stand considerable frost. Sashes may not have to be put on the cold frames for several weeks after the plants have been set. Plenty of ventilation will have to be allowed throughout winter. Hardiness is imperative and it can only be insured by such means.

Earthed up celery now sells well. That which is not sold must be kept well banked until next month when it is trenched. Cauliflower, if sufficiently matured, now brings a good price, as it is scarce. Usually, however, the crop needs some more moist weather to make it ready for the market. Plots that have been cropped now should be deeply spaded after rough manuring; or they may be plowed deeply and let stand for manuring in spring.

The Menace of Canada Thistles

We wonder if farmers generally have awakened to the terrible danger there is of Canada thistles ruining large areas of fine, fertile land in some of our farming states? Recently we traveled 500 miles by auto through a grand farming country in one of the northwestern states and were astonished and affrighted by the prevalence of the horrid pest mentioned. It was harvest time. The fields were filled with ripe and shocked grain; and, alas, in some districts the air was filled with thistledown flying in every direction and settling upon fields in which we saw no weeds of that sort. Actually, some fields of oats and barley looked to be scarcely worth cutting on account of thistles. Some shocks appeared to be a solid mass of thistles; at least more thistle tops than grain heads showed in the shocks. Worse still, we saw lots of ripe and shedding thistles along the roadside, in orchards and farmyards, and even in the gardens about farmhouses. People living in these districts apparently had become inured to the presence of the pest, or else they had given up the fight against them in disgust and concluded that it was hopeless.

But what of the county and township road commissioners and weed inspectors? And what of the laws that are supposed to require the eradication of noxious weeds, or at least the cutting of them so that they shall not ripen and shed their seeds to contaminate the land of innocent neighbors?

The trouble is that the statute books of every state are bursting with laws, some of which are foolish, unnecessary and therefore of little importance today, but hundreds of them, well worthy of enforcement such as those relating to weeds, are not well enforced. Farmers must take such matters into their own hands. It is dangerous to ignore the growing menace of Canada thistles and other noxious weeds. Each infested district should at once seriously tackle the problem and deal with it as though an enemy had invaded the land or a scourge descended upon the community. Only by immediate, concerted, vigorous, persistent action can Canada thistles be coped with successfully and we know of no more important and necessary work in districts where they are prevalent. We should like to hear from readers of COMFORT relative to this subject and to learn from them what methods of eradication have succeeded best in districts which have been overrun by the pest.

Medicated Wallows for Hogs

Answering the question of a reader, it may be stated that crude petroleum is the most suitable and effective medicament for hog wallows. The purpose of medicating the hog's bath is to destroy lice and mange mites, and crude petroleum not only is effective in that way but specially suitable in that it floats upon the surface of the water and readily spreads over the bodies of the hogs.

Experts of the Department of Agriculture have studied this subject and advise that wallows for hogs should be shallow. For pigs weighing from 40 to 80 pounds the wallow should be charged with liquid to a depth of about three inches. For hogs weighing from 80 to 150 pounds about four inches of liquid is sufficient. The depth may be increased to five or six inches for heavier hogs, but the medicated liquid in the wallow should not be so deep that the hogs will be afraid to lie down in it. When only one wallow is available for a mixed lot of hogs of various sizes, from three to four inches of liquid will give better results than a greater depth. The water should always be shallow and no medicine should be added until the hogs become accustomed to using the wallow. After the habit of using the wallow is well fixed, which usually requires three or four days, the depth may be increased, if necessary, and the medicament added.

The amount of crude petroleum to use is one pint for each pig and about one quart for each hog. Add more oil if it is seen that the bodies of the hogs using the wallow are not well coated with oil. Crude oil is distasteful to hogs and therefore the animals do not drink any of the water in the wallow.

The oil floating on the surface of the water limits or prevents evaporation and if the wallow is exposed to the direct rays of the sun during the hot summer months the water becomes heated to such a degree that the hogs will not lie in it. Wallows, therefore, should be shaded and the oil added in the evening. When added then it usually is carried out on the bodies of the hogs before noon of the next day. All wallows should be drained and cleaned as often as necessary to keep them and the surroundings in good sanitary condition.

Plans and directions for the construction of concrete hog wallows may be had by applying to the Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C. Ask for Farmers' Bulletin 1085.

Profitable Hog Husbandry

Some men are making fine profits from the breeding and feeding of market hogs. The production of pure-bred, pedigreed hogs is a different and special business requiring peculiar aptitude, executive ability and much experience. Comparatively few can succeed in that enterprise, but every farmer may make market-hog production profitable, or much more profitable than it often is on the average farm.

The Wrong Hog to Raise

A ship or locomotive may be supplied with hundreds of tons of the finest possible Welsh steam-coal, but if it have a defective or wasteful boiler or inefficient engine the energy of the coal will not be fully utilized, speed or endurance will be deficient and profits correspondingly lessened. In exactly the same way the farmer who is well supplied with good farm-raised grain and fodder and feeds it to the wrong kind of hog loses possible profits which the wiser possessor of the right type of hog earns and puts in the bank. First, therefore, let us see what is the wrong sort of hog.

All hogs of the so-called "razor-back" type are wrong for use by the man who owns good land that will produce standard crops of corn, clover or alfalfa, forage crops and small grains. There possibly is a place for the razor-back on wild lands that cannot be cultivated and where a modern, domesticated hog would starve to death, but the "railsplitter" hog is out of place and unprofitable on all farms where the well-bred, lard or bacon hog might thrive. The pattern of hog that cannot prove ideally profitable lacks smoothness, uniformity and fullness throughout. It is tall, slim, sharp along the backbone, where it should be wide and full, and light in the hams, like a dairy cow. It is built for speed and fighting and rooting ability rather than the putting on of flesh and fat. No hog of that sort utilizes expensive feed to good advantage, nor will it cut up a profitable carcass on the block.

The Right Type of Hog

The hog that comes soon to maturity, on the least amount of feed, and carries its flesh and fat upon the most profitable parts of its frame, is the one the packer wants and every farmer should try to produce. Breed is not the chief factor in obtaining such good qualities. It is absolutely necessary, however, that a pure breed of hogs should be used as the foundation of the farm herd, but one pure breed is about as good as the other, if its representatives are of first-class quality. The art of production comes from choice of such representatives for breeding and the development of the offspring by correct methods of management and feeding.

In the corn belt "lard-back" breeds, as they are termed by some, should be chosen for breeding, as they turn corn to the best advantage. The Poland China and Jersey Red, or Duroc, are the chief representatives of that type and both are magnificent animals when properly bred and fed. Then come the Berkshire, Hampshire or Saddleback hog, and the white breeds, including Chester Whites and Yorkshires, some of which are excellent for bacon, but the Tamworth probably leads the latter class of swine. Crosses among these breeds also make fine feeders. Many farmers like a cross between the Poland China and the Berkshire, or with a white Breed, but in the long run it is the better policy to start with one distinct breed and keep it pure by persistent, consecutive employment of males of the same breed year after year. The progeny need not be registered, but purity of blood and good selection will keep the herd up to standard type. Crossing, on the contrary, destroys breed character and prepotency and should not be resorted to if the females produced are to be used for breeding.

Hints on Market Type

Experts who have studied the markets and especially the packing house requirements, as the ultimate end of the farm-raised hog, have determined certain matters that should be as well understood by hog raisers. Some of these may well be mentioned here.

Regarding quality, it is advised that over-finished, extremely lardy meat is too fat for the best trade. At the same time, thin unfinished pork lacks the substance and maturity which is preferred. Moderate to good finish is most desirable and as a general thing will sell for the higher prices. Killing hogs should show the character we have already mentioned. Heavy shoulders and shallow, narrow hams yield too great a proportion of bone and shank to suit the consumer. Low, narrow backs cut out a pinched loin which produces smaller amounts of pork chops. Soft, wrinkled and seedy bellies never yield the trim, firm, attractive strips of bacon.

The Desirable Weight for Market

The best trade desires pork from good hogs which have been fattened at weights under 250 pounds. A 16-pound loin cuts chops weighing around one half pound each. An eight to nine-pound loin will yield four chops to the pound. Most families will pay more for a pound of pork containing four chops than for a pound containing only two. This naturally puts a premium on the lighter loins. The six to 10-pound bacon strips carry a more popular proportion of fat and lean than do the 14 to 20-pound bellies as cut from 300 to 350-pound hogs. The 10 to 14-pound hams are more nearly "family size" than is the 18 to 20-pound average.

The Grades of Pork

In the market, pork is divided into fresh pork, four grades of smoked meat, dry salt meat, mess pork, etc., on the basis of quality and weight. These various classes then are diverted to the trade which will absorb them at the highest possible values. The hogs which produce the choice handy-weight fresh cuts and the best quality of smoked meats naturally command the higher price on foot.

An Expert's Opinion

According to Dr. DeLoach, an expert economist of the Chicago Stock Yards, sudden demand for light English sides or for lard and provisions naturally causes some variation in the kind of hog which tops the market. However, the smooth, well-finished butcher hog which weighs between 190 and 250 pounds is the one whose pork generally finds the broadest outlet. "The ideal farmer's hog," he adds, "must be a combination of good breeding, good feeding and good killing qualities." The coming fairs and shows will give every hog man an opportunity to see the various types and judge the best kind suited to his needs. The most suitable type of hog should have stretch enough to be prolific; bone and size enough to feed economically, and character enough to produce the more popular kind and weight of pork."

A Word on Management

Given the right breed and type of hog, the modern farmer should understand that quick development is necessary to health, or avoidance of disease and worm invasion, and to insure the greater profit in the market. To these ends, then, the sow and boar should be in healthy, muscular condition at mating time, and the pregnant sow should be adequately fed mixed rations and be made to take abundant exercise every day that she may farrow easily and have plenty of milk for her pigs which should come strong and active. Then the pigs with their dam should have a clean colony house on green grazing crop, a succession of which should be provided from early spring until autumn. Milk should form an important part of the ration and instead of stuffing hogs on an all-corn diet, mixed rations should be supplied, including clover or alfalfa hay, when green crop is not available, and some digester tankage from a self-feeder. Sanitation is much more necessary and effective than drugs in preventing disease. Worms may be prevented by rotation of crops and clean feeding and drinking utensils, but vaccination will be necessary in districts where cholera is prevalent.

Success with Alfalfa

With the farmer in the irrigated section the growing of alfalfa is an easy problem to solve. But throughout the more humid sections, particularly in the Northern States, this very desirable crop is hard to grow.

WHY BOTHER WITH ALFALFA?—If alfalfa is hard to grow why not grow clover or timothy for hay, or some other hay crop? Why bother with a crop that is hard to grow? These are very natural questions for the farmer to ask. The answer is to be found in the fact that alfalfa is the best hay feed known—nearly twice as good pound for pound as clover, and five times as good as timothy. By this statement is meant that alfalfa contains the most protein of any hay crop, and protein is necessary to the growth of young animals and for the production of both meat and milk. Pound for pound, alfalfa is nearly as good as wheat bran which at the present price is worth fifty-three ($53.00) a ton. A hay that is worth fifty dollars ($50.00) a ton as a feed is certainly worth growing, and alfalfa hay has seldom been sold in the big markets in recent years for less than thirty dollars ($30.00) a ton. But alfalfa is hard to grow.

WHY ALFALFA WINTER KILLS.—In the Northern States, alfalfa often kills out during the winter and blue grass comes in to take its place. In a few years little alfalfa is left. Why does this happen? Because the right seed is not used. Southern-grown seed, unused to the hard climate of the Northern States, cannot stand up under severe winters. Hence Northern States should use northern-grown seed.

GRIMM ALFALFA BEST.—The Grimm variety is one of the best. Next to it stand the other Russian strains such as the Cossack and the Baltic. These strains come from a cold country and have stood up under severe winters for many years, hence do not easily kill out during very severe weather. The place to begin success with alfalfa, then, is in the purchase of the right variety of seed.

WHAT NEXT?—Alfalfa will not succeed on sour soil. Old soils that have been cropped for many years are usually sour. Sour soil is indicated by the kind of weeds that grow on it. Sour soil favors sour plants. Look for "sour dock," "horse sorrel," "sheep sorrel," "snake sorrel" and "horse tails"—all plants with a sour taste. An abundance of these weeds is a pretty sure sign that the soil is sour. Don't waste high-priced alfalfa seed on sour soil until you sweeten it with lime.

KILL THE WEEDS.—Young alfalfa plants are very tiny and start slow. On a weedy ground the weeds will choke and kill the plants before they get a good start. Don't plant alfalfa on weedy land. Kill the weeds by using a cultivated crop, then follow with alfalfa. If weeds bother after the alfalfa gets a start, run the mower over the field before the weeds have had a chance

How Eggs Are Formed and Produced

I AM asked so frequently why hens lay soft-shelled eggs, eggs with blood specks in them, eggs that are odd shaped, etc., that I am going to give our readers an explanation of the formation and process of producing eggs, and some of the causes of the abnormal results which surprise amateur poultry keepers from time to time.

Anyone, upon opening after death the body of a hen, will find a cluster of eggs in formation much like a bunch of grapes, and called the ovarium. These, however, are but rudimentary eggs, and are in size from a pinhead to the full sized yolk of an egg. Each of these eggs is contained within a thin transparent sack and attached by a narrow pipe or stem to the ovary, and during the laying period of the hen these eggs are maturing and thus keeping up the supply of eggs which she lays.

These rudimentary eggs have neither shell nor white, consisting wholly of yolk, on which floats the germ of the future chicken, and as they become larger they arrive at a certain stage when, by their own volition, weight, or other cause, they become detached from the bunch and fall into a sort of funnel leading to a passage called the oviduct, this organ in the hen being from 22 to 26 inches long.

During the passage of this egg or ovum to the outer world, it becomes coated with successive layers of albumen—the white—which is secreted from the blood vessels of the oviduct in the form of a thick, glairy fluid, and is prevented from mixing with the yolk by the membrane or sac which surrounded it before it became detached from the cluster. It is also strengthened by a second and stronger membrane, formed around the first immediately after falling into the funnel, and having what is like two twisted cords, of a more dense albuminous character, called by anatomists chalazes, which pass quite through the white at the ends, and being, as it were, embedded therein, thus preventing the yolk and germ from rolling about when the egg is moved, and serving to keep the germ so that it may best receive the heat imparted during incubation.

It is during the passing of the egg through the lower portion of the oviduct that it gets covered with the two skins which are found inside the shell. These, although lying close around the egg, at the thick end become separate, and form what is called the air bubble or chamber. This, in newly laid eggs, is a mere speck, and is that portion which shows the results of the evaporation previously referred to. This speck of air space becomes daily larger as the egg becomes older, and is frequently equal to one quarter of the entire egg. This egg chamber, if perforated with the finest needle, will prevent the egg from hatching.

When the egg is advanced more than half way down the oviduct, it is still destitute of a shell, which begins to be formed by a process of secretion, and when about completed, the various shades of brown and tinted coloring matter are imparted in those breeds in which colored eggs are peculiar. When the shell and coloring are complete, the egg continues to advance along the oviduct, till the hen goes to the nest and lays it.

Eggs are produced from the surplus food, which is that over and above what is required for the sustenance of the hen, and if such is too stimulating, or given in excess quantities, the result is is that in the former case the ova are produced so rapidly that sometimes two of them drop into the oviduct together, which results in the eccentricities which frequently puzzle the poultry keeper. These ova travel along together through the passage and receive the white separately, but become enveloped in one shell, and when laid are commonly known as double-yolked eggs, but more properly it is a double egg, the white being duplicated as well as the yolk. Should these yolks be fertilized and the egg hatched, we get the occasional four-legged or other chicken monstrosity.

A further result of stimulating food is varied from the above when the ova mature in excess of one day. In place of falling into the passage in pairs, as above, the two drop in separately, but on the same day. This results in soft eggs, not from the want of shell forming material, but rather because the shells cannot be formed as fast as the mature egg is ready for such covering.

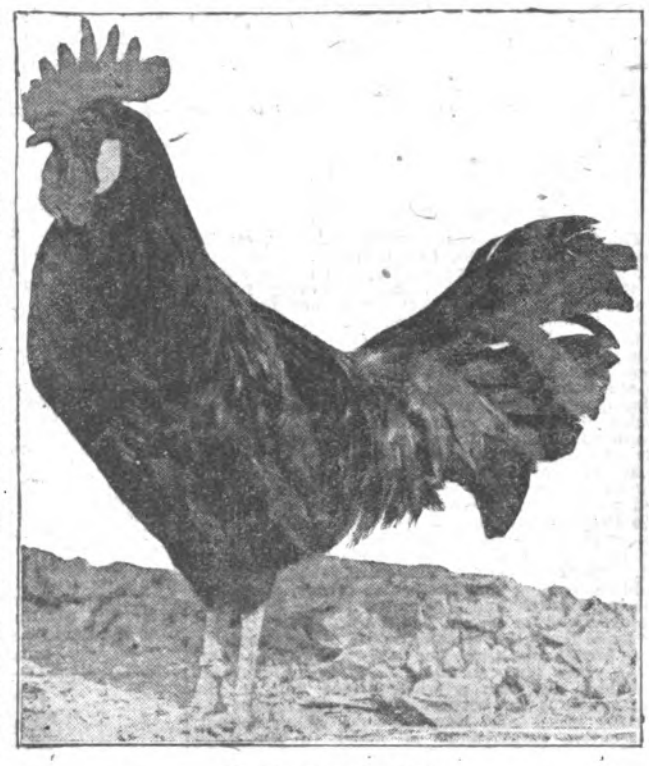
Crooked eggs are no uncommon thing in the poultry yard, and are attributable as follows: Twenty-four hours are usually sufficient for the formation of a perfect shell, but when by stimulation a second ovum falls close on its predecessor, reaching it before laid, the second egg, which up to this time is soft and is lying against the hard one, becomes covered with a shell, and when laid presents a flat or crooked side, the result of its position against the hard one.

To overfeeding is also attributable the further irregularity of one perfect egg being found within another, and caused by irritation of the oviduct, which, contracting in front of the perfectly formed egg, instead of behind it, forces it back until it meets another yolk, when the two join and become again coated with the white and the shell, thus producing another wonder. Other abnormalities are occasionally seen, and particularly in the smaller poultry yards. Sometimes when the ova are nearly exhausted by continuous laying, the secreting organs may be the most active, which results in small marble-sized but perfect-looking eggs, which are merely a shell covering a portion of albumen. Such "eggs," when laid, have the peculiarity of never having been at any stage attached to the ovary, but are a product only of the oviduct.

To the internal fatness of the hen are due other eccentricities than those mentioned, including the apparently paradoxical feat of laying rotten new laid eggs, this being a not infrequent occurrence. The egg, being unable to force its way through the fatty oviduct, is retained two or three days near the mouth of this organ, and, if a fertilized one, the heat of the hen's body tends to putrefy it, and when ultimately laid it is an addled condition. To other causes, but principally diseased organs, is due a departure from normal in the way of color. A hen which lays white or brown eggs, in rare occasions produces one almost black, and in most instances the shells are rough, wavy, corrugated or otherwise irregular. Then there are instances of foreign matter being found in eggs, clots of blood being nothing unusual. This is the result of the breaking of a blood vessel internally, and again, possibly the result of overfeeding.

Fowls from whatever cause producing any of the above misshapen or otherwise faulty eggs, should at once be got rid of, for although in some cases a reduced diet may bring them back to their normal production, still the slightest cause will frequently prompt the organs to their previous irregularities.

Keeping Eggs for Winter Use



First, the egg should be infertile, and quite fresh. Don't use eggs from "stolen" nests, or any that you are not sure are positively fresh, and without testing them. Candling is the safest way of testing them. Do this in a darkened room. If you have not a tester lamp, put a common lamp, lantern, electric bulb or any other light into a box. Have a hole in the box smaller than an egg and directly opposite the light. The box should also have a hole at the top to release heat and smoke.

Hold the egg with the large end up, close to the lighted hole. If the egg is perfectly fresh and good it will look clear, its yolk but faintly outlined. The air space will be hardly visible, only one eighth to three sixteenths of an inch in depth. If this air space is larger, with a movable lower line, it means the egg is stale or becoming weak and watery. Any small, dark spots that may be seen are usually blood clots. If heat or germination has been doing its work, large dark spots, blood rings or shadows will appear. A very dark or black egg with a large, fixed air space is a fertile one with a well-developed chick. When dark and with a large air space showing a movable lower line, it has become that famous old-time political weapon—a rotten egg.

Keep the nests clean, and gather eggs twice a day to prevent the shell being soiled. Washing in soapy water is injurious, for it removes the substance which fills the pores of the shell and protects the egg from germs. Should an egg get slightly soiled, cloth dampened with vinegar will remove the stains without injury. But if it is very dirty don't try to preserve it. It is hardly necessary to say that a cracked egg is not fit for packing.

The question of a container comes up next. The best is an earthenware or stone crock or jar. It won't leak or rust or taste—it keeps the eggs in fine condition.

A five-gallon crock will hold fifteen dozen eggs. Clean it thoroughly, scald and dry. Put into it nine quarts of water that has been boiled and cooled. Add one quart of sodium silicate or water glass, which you can buy at the drug store. Stir well together. Set the eggs carefully in the crock. If you have not enough to fill it at once, put them in from time to time. Be sure the solution always covers them by two inches. Close the crock with a tight lid or waxed paper tied down, and set in a cool, dry place.

BLACK MINORCA COCK.

Carefully selected eggs laid down in this way will keep from six to twelve months. The authorities admit that they are likely to deteriorate a little after the sixth month. We are assured that for that length of time they are good enough to serve in any form. But if you boil them, they will crack because of the expansion of air in them. To avoid this, puncture the large end with a pin before putting the egg into the water.

Water glass solution should not be used a second time unless it has kept quite clear and is free from odor and thick sediment.

A. J. J.—For one hundred laying hens the house should be about 25x14 feet. The following rations are recommended by the government for laying hens, and you can select the one best adapted to your local conditions and prices. Feeds not included in these rations may be added or substituted on the basis of their comparative analysis, provided the meat scrap or animal protein feeds are not replaced by cottonseed meal or other high vegetable protein feeds. All changes in the feed should be made gradually, as sudden changes may decrease egg production materially.

Ration No. 1

Mash.	Scratch Mixture.
6 lbs. corn meal,	1 lb. cracked corn,
6½ " meat scrap,	1 lb. wheat,
1 lb. bran,	1 lb. oats.
1 lb. middlings.

Ration No. 2

2 lbs. corn meal or barley meal,	1 lb. meat or fish scrap.
	2 lbs. cracked corn,
1 lb. bran,	1 lb. oats,
1 lb. middlings,	1 lb. wheat or barley.

Ration No. 3

3 lbs. corn meal,	2 lbs. cracked corn,
1 lb. meat scrap.	1 lb. oats.

Ration No. 4

9 lbs. corn meal,	2 per cent bone meal,
5 lbs. middlings,	2 lbs. cracked corn,
4 lbs. bran,	1 lb. wheat,
2 lbs. cottonseed or gluten meal,	1 lb. oats,
2 lbs. meat scrap,	1 lb. barley.

Ration No. 5

1 lb. corn meal,	2 lbs. cracked corn,
1 lb. bran,	1 lb. wheat,
¾ lb. meat scrap,	1 lb. oats,
1 lb. middlings,	1 lb. barley.
1 lb. ground oats.

Ration No. 6

3 lbs. corn meal,	2 lbs. cracked corn,
1 lb. bran,	1 lb. wheat,
1 lb. middlings,	1 lb. oats.
½ lb. meat scrap.

Feed with table scraps or cooked vegetables.

Ration No. 5 is especially adapted for yearlings or old hens of breeds inclined to get too fat, such as the Plymouth Rock, Orpington and Wyandotte. As corn meal, fed with the meat scrap, is very fattening, those two feeds are cut down in the ration.

With Ration No. 6 feed all table scraps available, or vegetables at the rate of five pounds daily to thirty hens.

Five per cent of bone meal may be used in any of these mashes and the quantity of meat scrap reduced accordingly, or two per cent of bone meal may be added without changing the mashes.

The scratch mixture should be fed twice a day, preferably scattered broadcast on litter three to five inches deep on the floor of the henhouse. Give about one third in the morning and two thirds in the afternoon, which means giving them only what they will eat up clean in fifteen minutes; in the evening enough to fully satisfy them. Mash, either dry or moist, must be fed in addition to scratch grain. Dry mash is kept in a hopper constantly before the hen. Most mash is fed only once a day, preferably in the morning or at noon, and only as much should be given as the birds will eat up clean in fifteen minutes. A moist mash is more convenient and profitable for a small home flock, as all table scraps and cooked vegetables can be mixed with it. Most mash is improved if mixed with milk instead of water. The quantity of the meat scrap mixed in the mash can be reduced in proportion to the garbage and milk used. A light feed of moist mash sometimes may be fed to supplement the dry mash to pullets in the fall, if they do not eat the dry mash freely.

If hens show a tendency to become too fat, make them work longer for their feed by feeding the scratch grains in a deep litter; feed less scratch grain and reduce the quantity of meat scrap in the mash. It is sometimes necessary to close or hang up the dry mash hopper until noon to make the hens work harder for their feed. Feed the same rations or combinations of feeds throughout the year and do not try to force the moult prematurely by special methods of feeding or by abnormal rations.

Quantity of Grain to Feed

The feeder must use his own judgment in deciding how much grain to give the hens, as the amount of feed which they will eat varies with different pens and at different seasons of the year. They will eat more feed in the spring when laying heavily, than in the summer and fall when laying fewer eggs. A fair general estimate is to feed about one quart of scratch grains and an equal weight of mash (about 1½ quarts) daily to thirteen of the general purpose breeds, such as the Plymouth Rocks, Rhode Island Reds, or Wyandottes, or to sixteen hens of the smaller or egg breeds. This would be about 7½ pounds each of scratch grains and of mash daily to one hundred Leghorns, and about 9½ pounds of each to one hundred general purpose fowls. If hens have free range or large yards containing green feed, a general purpose hen will eat about 75 pounds of feed in a year, and a Leghorn will eat about 55 pounds, in addition to the green stuff consumed.

Meat Feed Makes Eggs

Meat scrap or some other animal feed high in protein is the one essential constituent of the mash which cannot well be omitted. In our experiments a pen of pullets, on free range, which did not get meat scrap or any other animal protein feed, laid only 90 eggs each in a year, compared with yields of from 125 to 150 eggs from pens fed rations containing meat scrap. The eggs from the pen where no meat scrap was fed cost 2.2 cents more a dozen for feed than when the meat scrap was included in the ration. Fish meal or fish scrap can be used to replace the meat scrap and compares favorably with a good grade of meat scrap containing the same per cent of protein. Skim-milk or buttermilk, either sweet or sour, is excellent for replacing part or all of the meat scrap. The milk may be used in mixing the mash if a moist mash is fed, or it can be kept before the fowls as a drink. If clabbered and fed thick or like cheese, hens will eat enough of it to replace all the meat scrap needed. A little bone meal makes an excellent addition to the mash, or it can be used to replace part of the meat scrap. Green cut bone if fresh and sweet, will also take the place of meat scrap if fed at the rate of one third to one half ounce daily per hen. If too much is fed it will give the fowls diarrhea or looseness of the bowels.

High vegetable protein feeds do not entirely replace meat or animal protein feeds to advantage, but in sections where they are produced may be used to replace one fourth to one half the meat scrap. Of the high vegetable protein feeds, cottonseed meal has given us the best results, followed by peanut meal, soy bean meal, and velvet bean meal, named in the order of their values. Not more than one tenth of the mash should be composed of cottonseed meal, as the use of a large proportion of the cottonseed meal cuts down the egg yield materially, and may affect the quality of the eggs, producing spots and blotches on the yolks which make them look bad. Other high vegetable protein feeds which can be used with success for poultry are gluten and linseed meal.

Green Feeds Grit and Oyster Shells

Green feeds should be supplied to hens confined to small yards, and also to all hens during the winter, when no green feed is available in the yards. Free range or large yards kept in grass will furnish ideal conditions for green feed, and where smaller yards have to be used, they should be divided into two parts and used alternately, planting the vacant section two or three times a year with a quick growing green crop, such as wheat, oats, rape, rye or barley. This method furnishes green feed and also helps to keep the yards sweet and clean, which is a very important consideration.

Good kinds of green feeds are alfalfa meal, chopped alfalfa and clover hay, cabbages and mangel beets. In ordinary cellars cabbages do not keep so well as mangel beets, so they should be used up first. Cabbages may be hung up in the poultry house; the beets are usually split and stuck on a nail on the side wall of the pen about a foot above the floor. Vegetables which have been frozen can be thawed out and fed to the fowls, but do not keep well after thawing. Clover and alfalfa may be cut into one quarter or one half inch lengths, or they may be bought in the form of meal.

Keep oyster shells and grit before the hens all the time. These substances are an inexpensive but quite necessary part of the ration. Hens will eat about two pounds of oyster shell and about one pound of grit each in a year.

S. R. S.—It is impossible to diagnose such a case without personal examination of the carcasses, but as nearly as I can judge from your description there must have been some injury or malformation about the egg organs. Please read the first part of the department this month. As you have three other hens which show signs of being out of condition, there may be some other solution of the trouble, such as lime, commercial fertilizer or poisonous spray material. Are any such things being used around the farm? Such strong irritants are liable to affect the digestion and entrails if fowls can get at them.

D. E. S.—The hen must have eaten something which burned her throat and affected her bowels. Please read the latter part of answer to S. R. S. Castor oil is the best thing you could have given her. Vinegar, soda and permanganate of potassium are about the worst for they will only aggravate the trouble. If her throat and crop are still sensitive, she will not want to eat, and so you must continue to feed her, but instead of the corn-meal gruel, give her thick rice-water mixed with the white of an egg—about equal parts of each.

Automobile and Gas Engine Helps

Questions relating to gasolene engines and automobiles, by our subscribers, addressed to COMFORT Auto Dept., Augusta, Maine, will be answered by our expert, free, in the columns of this department. Full name and address is required, but initials only will be printed. That we may intelligently diagnose your trouble please state the year in which your car was made.

Acetylene Gas

APPROXIMATELY ten years ago the automobile had progressed to a point where manufacturers were using acetylene headlights as standard equipment. In many instances acetylene starters were used, but these did not become so popular as the acetylene gas lighting system. The earlier cars made use of a generator to produce the acetylene gas but this system was superceded gradually by a cylinder which stored the gas under pressure. The objections to the generator were the odor and work involved in maintaining a clean tank. Many trucks still use the acetylene headlights but for passenger cars this system has been superceded by electricity.

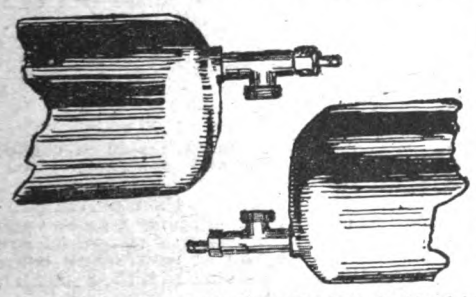
The cylinder or tank in which the gas is stored is not a hollow shell into which gas is forced under great pressure. The tank is filled with a porous packing which is saturated with a liquid chemical. This chemical in turn has the peculiar property of absorbing twenty-five times its own volume of acetylene for each atmosphere of pressure applied during the charging process.

Cross Section of Acetylene Cylinder showing porous filling.

Due to the presence of this liquid chemical, the tank should not be placed with the valve down. Such a position would allow the chemical to flow from the tank, obstruct the flow of gas and discolor the flame. The tank should always be installed with the valve in the uppermost position.

The correct acetylene flame for lighting purposes should be as high as possible without blowing, and nearly level across its top. If the burner has two openings, the gas should not be turned down so that the two points of the flame do not meet. The points must meet, otherwise the openings in the burner will carbonize and become clogged.

There are several types of gauges attached to acetylene tanks. Some register in atmospheres, others in pounds, while some gauges register in both atmospheres and pounds. If the gauge registers atmospheres only, the pounds may be estimated by multiplying the pressure in atmospheres by 15.



Acetylene gas pressure is affected by heat and cold. For example, let us consider that the pressure of a fully charged tank is 225 pounds at 60 degrees Fahrenheit. The car is driven out of the garage and allowed to stand in the hot sun. The pressure in the tank may rise to 315 pounds or 21 atmospheres. Take the opposite condition, exposing the tank to a low temperature and the gauge may show only 135 pounds pressure. However, the contents of the tank are determined in weight and not by volume. The gauge which registers pressure is not an accurate record of the gas and is intended for the user's convenience so that he may determine the approximate amount of gas in the tank.

Align Front Wheels

Due to having traveled over rough roads and subjecting the car to more or less abuse, it might be a good plan to check up the alignment of the front wheels. If the wheels are misaligned the tread will wear off the front tires. As a rule, manufacturers recommend that the distance between the wheels at the front should be from one eighth to one fourth inch less than the distance between the wheels when measured at the back.

Pick Ups

The state of Oregon has deviated from the usual custom of placing a tax on automobiles according to the horse-power rating. The owners are assessed one cent a gallon on gasolene and one half cent a gallon on distillate.

Due to the presence of the liquid the tank should not be placed with the valve down.

One third of the motor vehicles registered in this country are owned by farmers.

In the old days a person convicted of horse stealing would be sentenced from eight years to hanging. The automobile thief is released with a light fine or short confinement in jail.

Automobiles and agricultural machinery are now being manufactured at the Krupp Works at Essen, Germany. During the war this firm was the chief source for German cannon.

Mary Garden, the opera singer, is using five motor trucks to carry her wardrobe and other accessories on a brief tour of southern France.

Questions Answered

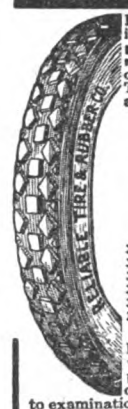
USES TOO MUCH OIL.—I have a 1917 Ford that uses too much oil. It has new piston rings, Inland rings on top, and does not foul the plugs or smoke much. Do you think the oil could go to the differential, and if so, how can I stop it? I can't keep oil from coming out at the wheels and I never fill the differential, for when I take the plug out oil comes out as if under pressure. N. L. P., Indian School, Phoenix, Ariz.

A.—Although you state that your car uses too much oil, you have failed to advise as to the exact amount consumed. It might be a good plan for you to wash the motor with gasolene and then run the engine for a few minutes. You should then have no difficulty in determining whether any oil is leaking out. The writer has found it helpful to remove the cylinder block and drill about four three-sixteenth inch holes in the skirt of each piston. Providing the cylinders are pumping oil, the holes provide channels of escape for the lubricant back into the crank-case. The holes can cause no damage to the motor. The writer prevented lubricant from running on the rear wheels by removing the wheel and taking out the roller bearing. Force the old felt washer behind the bearing and use a new felt washer for the wheel end of bearing.

CARBON TROUBLE.—My wife has taken your magazine for a long time and I always take a look at your Auto Department. I would like to know why I have had to take the cylinder heads off my Overland car about every six months and clean the carbon out. If I do not the engine will pound, and yet there is not more than four or five level tablespoonfuls of carbon. Last fall I had one of the new-fangled rings on each piston, but I can't see that they have done a bit of good in the matter of compression or keeping the carbon out. When I cleaned out the carbon the last time I took hold of the pistons to see how loose they were. I could move them just a trifle. I don't see how larger pistons could be got in, but that is what they try to make me believe I ought to have. I told them I could not see why larger pistons should be required as I have had the car only three years and it has been run only 2,400 miles, and at that only when the roads were good. I have had six or seven blow-outs in the three years and always when the car was standing still. Can you give me any helpful information?

F. B., Wall Lake, Iowa.

A.—Even under the best of conditions some carbon will collect in the cylinders and require to be removed every 1000 to 1500 miles the car is run. If with proper care your car has been run only 2500 miles, neither the cylinders nor the pistons should show any appreciable wear. It takes about 1000 miles run to smooth and glass the cylinders of a new engine. Unless you are a mechanic experienced in the handling of fine work it is almost impossible for you to determine the fit of a piston in the cylinder. Cast-iron pistons are usually allowed .003 clearance on the skirt while aluminum pistons are given about .005 inch clearance. A .005 to .008 inch clearance for a cast-iron piston would be considered a "sloppy" fit. The only way to determine accurately the clearance existing in your cylinders is to obtain a set of steel gauges often referred to as "feelers." These gauges are of different thicknesses and you should insert the different ones between the cylinder wall and piston until you find one that is a snug fit. If the clearance is great you undoubtedly will require new pistons or if the bores are worn oval shape it will necessitate their regrinding and fitting with new pistons before relief will be obtained. On the other hand, you may be using an oil which is heavy in carbon. You might try changing the brand of oil. Be sure to clean out all the old oil so as to give the new brand a thorough test. If an improvement is not noted and you do not find the clearance in the cylinders to be too great, would suggest drilling about four three-sixteenth holes in the skirt of each piston. These openings will afford channels of escape for the excess lubricant. It is almost impossible to give any advice from this range regarding the condition of your tires. The tires may have been injured on the road so as to leave the casings in a weakened condition. Providing you carry full air pressure, it might be possible that the sun caused the pressure to rise sufficiently to force the tire plies apart. If you believe that road conditions in your vicinity are such that better mileage should have been obtained from this set of tires, we would suggest taking the matter up directly with the tire manufacturer.



MIS-FIRES AND STOPS.—The engine of my 1916 Studebaker Six runs well while idle, but after I start the car it may run for an hour all right and then begin missing and finally stop. It does this at times for two or three miles and then maybe it will run all right for 10 or 15 miles. I have had the car only a few days so I do not know how long it has been doing this. Information and advice will be appreciated.

L. R. C., Coffeyville, Kans.

A.—Remove the carburetor, gas line and vacuum tank and clean them thoroughly. It might be that dirt or other foreign matter is impeding the flow of fuel. Go over the wiring for loose connections and make certain that terminals do not touch each other.

Even though it may be true that the motor-driven vehicle has begun to put the farm horse "on the run," there is no evidence that he has developed much speed, and his total value still compares favorably with other classes of farm animals. On January 1, 1920, the Bureau of Crop Estimates of the United States Department of Agriculture estimated the total value of horses on farms in this country at $1,993,000,000, or just a little below the value of milk cows, which was $2,022,000,000.

THIS "blue October weather" is apt to make dreamers, day dreamers, of the best of us, so remember, girls, that it is the doers and not the dreamers that get ahead in the world. If you are at school, don't dream of leading your classes but dig in and do it, or try to, which is next best to succeeding. This applies to the girl in the office, at home or in any walk of life. Dreams are good things to have, though, if you'll work to make them come true. Maybe it is a dream of mine to help the girls that come to me with their troubles, so I'll begin with FATTY AND SLIM, Florida.—No, I don't think a young girl should "bum a strange young man for a dope"—whatever that means. It doesn't sound respectable. A suit of underwear would hardly be a suitable birthday present for a young man from a girl. Can't you think of something equally useful and that will bear no suggestion of indelicacy?

LUCY, S. C.—There are some people so constituted that if they can't or won't be happy themselves they don't want anyone else to be, so don't let anything they say worry you. If you can get along without quarreling before you are married it looks reasonable to suppose that you have a better chance of getting along without quarreling after you are married, despite what your friends say to the contrary. Don't pay any attention to them but devote all your energy to so living that there won't ever be any quarrels. They are ugly things and no amount of making up quite takes away the scar.

BERNICE, Georgia.—Matrimony, my dear, is a serious thing and I don't like to advise for or against it without knowing more of the facts than you gave in your letter. There must be some reason why your people do not like him; but if there isn't you needn't let that stand in the way. You say you will have to work for your living until you marry. That's what a lot of girls think and nine and one-half times out of ten they find that their work is at an end when they marry—but it's the beginning end instead of the finish end. That doesn't hurt them either if the man they marry is the right sort.

D. E. B., Massachusetts.—Such expressions as "I'll tell the world," "I'll say so," and "You'd be surprised," are all right if that is the extent of one's vocabulary, but I'm sure you aren't obliged to resort to such means of expressing yourself. An ignorant or an ill-bred person might, but you are neither.

Blue Eyes of Illinois tells me that she is almost seventeen years old and has never been allowed to go with boys and asks me what I would advise her to do. Read some of the back numbers of COMFORT, the sorrows of girls her age who are in love, or not in love with the right one, or the right one doesn't love them, and then thank your lucky stars that your parents have kept you from being heartbroken or world-weary at the age of almost seventeen. That means, sixteen years, one month and fourteen and one-half days.

TOPSY, Mo.—'Tis sad but true that nobody loves a fat man. Here's a model young man, with an automobile and everything, but Topsy doesn't like to go out with him because he is fat. Is he naturally and chronically fat, Topsy, or is it a result of wrong diet and not enough exercise? If it is the former, you might as well give up now for he will only get fatter and fatter, but if it is the latter, exercise and diet will work wonders. Anyway, fat men are almost always good-natured and I'd rather have a good-natured fat husband than a grouchy thin one, though I don't care so much for very fat men myself—but I suppose I'd be grateful for any kind.

Florence of Colorado, wants to know if it would be all right for her beau to give her a pig for a birthday present. Dear, dear, such funny questions as you girls have asked this month—fat men and pigs! What will you think of next? If you are rooming out in a little two-by-four room, a pig would be a most inappropriate and inconvenient gift but if you are at home on the farm and have a nice clean pen all ready for piggie, it would be a valuable gift, with the price of ham and bacon soaring so high that we are inclined to believe it was a pig and not a cow that jumped over the moon. I'm not so sure it is the proper thing but I'd hate to have anyone offer me a nice pig on my birthday unless he meant it.

MIRIAM, Virginia.—My dear, you are only a little girl in years even if you are larger than I am, and little girls of fifteen don't fall desperately in love with anyone, least of all their very own sister's husband. You'll just have to get over such nonsense, if you haven't already, and in a little while you will laugh at yourself, and feel a wee bit ashamed, too, for being such a silly. Get outdoors and play and don't read so many trashy magazines.

E. F., Illinois.—Don't "manage" to get acquainted with any man. Let him do the managing, if he wants to, and if he wants to you may depend upon it that he will. The fact that you are both musical should provide a common topic for conversation. It would be only courteous for you to ask him to call.

WIDOW JANE, Iowa.—You aren't really a "widow" if your husband just disappeared, and you have no proof of his death. I'm not positive as to the legal side of it, so don't take my word for it, but am of the impression that you'll have to wait seven years before being free to marry again. Make certain before marrying anyone, young or old, rich or poor. That you will have to decide for yourself—you know what they say about being an "old man's darling or a young man's slave."

GREENIE, Wis.—"Is it fashionable for a girl to wear a fan to a picnic or dance, and should it be tied around the neck and shoulders or the neck only?" If it is a very wild and woolly fan and you think there is any danger of it escaping, I'd advise you to tie it around your neck and shoulders both, otherwise, the neck alone might be sufficient. Seriously, my dear, I'll have to put aside my dignity and go to a dance and find out for sure, but I rather think fans are carried, not worn, only on quite formal occasions, with evening gowns. The fans the shops are showing are so beautiful and expensive looking they would appear out of place at an ordinary dance. The only fans I've ever seen used at a picnic were the palm leaf variety. (2) It would be less embarrassing for you if you could take a few private lessons in dancing before attempting it in public. You are old enough to learn if your parents are willing.

BROWN EYES, N. Dak.—If the "sun is just coming up" when you are returning from a dance it would be proper to invite your escort into the house—for breakfast; otherwise he shouldn't expect to be invited, and, anyway, that's too late-early to be out. (2) If he wants you to write to him when you move out of town he will ask you to, though it would be proper enough to send him, and other friends, a card. (3) Don't deliberately exhibit your photographs to young men unless you want them to ask for one.

KITTY, S. C.—If you don't know what to say when a clerk says "thank you" as he gives you your package, you might beat him to it and say "thank you" first and let him do the worrying. Just a pleasant little smile would answer the purpose all right, I should think. Don't be afraid of thanking anyone for any service, be it ever so slight. Politeness is the one thing that doesn't cost anything, no matter how much we have to pay for everything else. (2) Ask your boy friend why he is "mad" at you and tell him you don't want to have anything happen to break up your friendship. That should give you a chance to clear yourself of any falsehoods told against you. Then if he still persists in being mad, let him have a good time and get as "mad" as he wants to. (3) I'm sorry, Kitty, that you are such a "solm" looking girl and the best way I know of to make yourself look pleasant is to smile. There are ever so many funny things happening every day and pleasant things as well, and I'm sure you have your share of both, so turn the corners of your mouth up instead of down. Smiles, like politeness, don't cost anything. Have one on me.

That's all for this time and now I'm off for a long walk to get up an appetite for turkey—Thanksgiving will soon be here.

'By, COUSIN MARION.

Audrey's Recompense

winding now through fairy glades, now over picturesque hills.

Never had there been a gayer, happier, or more buoyant party, as they alighted by the margin of the beautiful sheet of water where they were to spend the day, not one dreamed of the sad drama which would there be begun, to result in long years of bondage and sorrow to one, at least of their number.

They were to take boats for a sail, and to visit a large island and some ruins, which, tradition said, had once been a Spanish castle, and which attracted romance-loving visitors in large numbers every year.

There were two boats awaiting them, managed by experienced boatmen, and these were quickly filled by the pleasure-seekers, and when Arthur Halstead and his companion, who had been a little behind the others, owing to one of the horses getting a stone in his shoe, arrived on the spot, they found that there was not an inch of room to spare in either.

"What are we going to do?" he asked one of the boatmen, his tone betraying something of the annoyance which he felt.

"Can you row?" the man asked.

"Like an old sailor," promptly responded Arthur Halstead.

"Well, then, I've got a little boat down yonder," pointing to a tiny craft which was rocking upon the water not far from them. "I call her the Fairy Queen, and she's just big enough for the two of ye. You can take this key, go and get her, and come after us.

Arthur gave one glance at his companion's face. It was like the after-glow of sunset upon snow. Then he turned away and strode toward the little boat more disturbed and angry than he would have cared to have shown, while the other boats pushed away from the shore with their merry freight.

Arthur found the Fairy Queen a dainty little craft worthy of her name, and, having assisted Miss Montrose to enter, he grasped the oars, and with swift, unerring strokes, he sped lightly over the water and soon overtook his companions.

Arriving at the island, everybody was soon ashore, and it was the work of only a moment to pass the chain of the little boat around a post of the landing, turn the key in the padlock attached to it, and thus fasten it securely, as Arthur thought, and then he followed his companions up the hill toward the ruins, where they were to lunch.

But he had not fastened the boat securely—he had not turned the lock at all, and as the Fairy Queen danced lightly upon the waves the padlock worked itself loose—the chain gradually slipped until it freed itself from the staple, and then, like a mischievous sprite, she floated stealthily away, until far down the island a gust of wind swept her into a little vine-covered cove, where she nestled cozily beneath the cool shadows, and lay like a fairy asleep and wholly unconscious of the harm that she was thus bringing upon two innocent people.

For an hour the party wandered about, exploring the ruins, gathering vines and grasses and flowers, and then they had their lunch.

During lunch, Ida had descried, hanging from the rude wall of a portion of the old ruins, a cluster of bright scarlet flowers.

"Do you suppose we could get them?" she asked, calling Arthur's attention to them.

"We can try," he answered, willing to gratify so slight a request, and so they had wandered away after dinner to see what the prospect was for securing those coveted blossoms.

They found a place where several huge blocks of stone had fallen from the wall, making a sort of rude staircase, and, with a little dextrous climbing, they thought they might accomplish their purpose.

"Let me go alone and get them," Arthur urged.

"No, please let me go, too—I shall like the adventure; besides I have a notion that we shall see something fine from the top of that wall," Ida returned, with animation.

But she was panting with fatigue when she at last stood upon the summit.

"You are tired—it was too much for you," Arthur said. "Sit here," he added, "there is a stone higher than the others, and it will make quite a comfortable seat for you."

"Yes, I am tired," she assented, sinking wearily upon it. But, oh!" she exclaimed, with a sudden delight, her creamy face taking on that rosy after-glow again, "what a view! I told you I thought we should find something fine up here."

And truly it was a scene to be long remembered.

The ruins were upon a hill, and the lovely island, surrounded by the sunlit waters, seemed like an emerald set in silver; while beyond, the mainland stretched away, on one hand to verdure-clad hills, on the other to green meadows and orange groves.

Arthur Halstead's face kindled as his fine eyes roved over the scene.

"It is worth climbing for," he said.

He leaned over as he ceased speaking, plucked the flowers,—a great, massive cluster of deepest crimson—which she had coveted, and laid them in her lap.

"Oh, thank you; they are very beautiful," Ida cried.

Suddenly they heard their names called from below, and looking over the wall, Arthur asked what was wanted.

The party was going to visit a grotto about a mile up the island, and they wished him and Miss Montrose to accompany them.

"Will you go?" he asked, turning to Ida.

She glanced up at him, flushed slightly, hesitated, then answered:

"If you do not mind, I would prefer to sit here and enjoy this view until they return. But," she added, "do not let me keep you. I shall not mind staying alone, and the place may be of interest to you."

"No; I shall stay with you," he answered, quietly, but feeling very uncomfortable, nevertheless.

It would seem ungallant, he thought, to leave her there alone, even if it would not be absolutely unsafe.

He turned again to those below and called out: "Miss Montrose is weary and not equal to the long walk, and so we will remain where we are, while you are gone."

"All right," was the response from below, "only it will take us some time to go, and we shall return, the guide says, by the way of the Witches' Glen."

"Very well; then we will meet you at the boat-landing," Arthur returned; then, as their friends trooped away, he seated himself near his companion, and they fell to talking of various things.

Miss Montrose had been an extensive traveler; her power of description was vivid and inspiring, and Arthur soon found himself listening to her with an interest that was absorbing.

"What a beautiful, talented girl she is!" he said to himself, but no tenderer sentiment than admiration thrilled him. He simply admired her as a lovely, gifted woman.

The time flew by on magic wings, until the sun began to slip down behind the distant hills, and warned them that they ought to have gone to the boat-landing long ago.

A useful little cushion can be made of the round pasteboard bolt which comes with ribbon. A bolt from No. 5 ribbon makes a very good size. Put several layers of wool over one end of it, and over that stretch a piece of unbleached muslin, pasting it to the edges of the bolt with good library paste. When it is dry, cover the cushion in the same way with a piece of brocade or cretonne and around the edge paste a gold or silver braid.

"Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

Through the columns of this department free information pertaining to Etiquette, Personal Appearance and kindred subjects will be given in answer to questions by our subscribers, but not more than two questions the same month by any one subscriber. Address Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and give your own full name and address. Name will not be published.

J. B. M., Cashiers, N. C.—A few broad rules regarding introductions are as follows: As a general custom, a simple naming, in a distinct voice, of both parties suffices. Gentlemen are always presumed to be introduced or presented to ladies and the lady's name is thus mentioned first: "Miss Blank, Mr. Dash," or, more formally, "Miss Blank, I want to present Mr. Dash." Of the same sex, the younger person is introduced to the older. Exception to this rule and the others given might occur in the case of some distinguished man to whom it would seem best that other guests should be presented, as: "Senator Blank, this is Miss Dash." No set forms are needed or desirable in acknowledging introductions. It is not necessary to shake hands although men always do this. It is pleasant and best we think for a lady to extend her hand with a bow, a smile and a simple "how do you do." Other conversation may be then left to follow as it may among the persons present.

SEMI-BLONDS, Grandview, Ark.—At any wedding, and more particularly at a formal church ceremony, the duties of the "best man" consist in aiding the groom in every possible manner. He looks out for all details of the ceremony which properly devolve upon the groom—such as the carriage and train in which the happy couple depart; he accomplishes all necessary messages and errands; he has the ring ready during the ceremony, and he may be left by the groom to fee the clergyman. The duties of a bridesmaid are not so complex. While technically she is an attendant and aid to the bride, in actuality there is little for her to do but look as charming as possible as she accompanies the wedding party up to the altar.

V. O. R., Dennis, Ky.—Read the reply to J. B. M., Cashiers, N. C., in this column. Do not say: "Miss B meet Miss C."

SWEET SIXTEEN, Camden, Ark.—It is more courteous for the girl to offer her hand and we think she should do this when receiving a caller in her own home. (2) It is best that a girl should ask into the house any young man who calls to escort her to dance or party. She should, however, have so timed her preparations that her escort has not long to wait.

L. G., Manito, Ill.—In eating prunes, the pits are removed from the mouth by the spoon and placed upon the saucer or plate containing the fruit. (2) You may properly sit by the roadside while awaiting the mail carrier if such waiting does not expose you to unpleasant publicity or comment from passersby.

R. E. R., Sharpsburg, Ga.—The conventional costume for a bride is white or cream colored silk or satin trimmed with lace. A veil may or may not be worn. Many brides are married in a "going away" gown, which may be a plain tailored costume with hat and gloves to match. But it is properly and fortunately a long road from the sixth grade to the altar. (2) All shades of tan and brown, and many shades of blue, are harmonious colors to be worn by a "girl with light red hair." Avoid red and all shades of pink and green.

CHUMS OF WEST VIRGINIA.—The answer to your question depends upon what you mean by "young man." A schoolgirl of your age may have boy friends among her schoolmates, but she should in no way receive attentions from young men as the term is generally understood. (2) You may have these friends to dinner if your parents have no objection and are themselves present.

BROWN EYES, Concord, N. C.—If a boy is deliberately rude to you, you may as soon as possible leave him and decline any acquaintance with him in the future unless he makes full and satisfactory apology for his conduct. (2) There should be no unchaperoned automobiling at night.

I. L., Parrish, Ala.—If this young man has obtained a proper decree of divorce and he is in every way acceptable both to you and your parents as a fiance, we see no reason why you should let any feeling against his first unfortunate marriage stand in the way of your love and happiness. You should make sure, however, regarding the conditions of the divorce and for what reasons it was granted.

C. J. G., Vincent, Ala.—It is proper that you should raise your hat and say some phrase of farewell when leaving a lady with whom you have been conversing. (2) When offering assistance to a lady, you should raise your hat. It is not always necessary to reply to thanks given for certain courtesies you may have offered. If you wish, you might say: "I am very glad to have been able to help you."

TWO LONELY GIRLS, Concord, N. C.—Although you may not think so now, we can assure you that it is much better to be "lonely" than to be disobedient. You are schoolgirls yet, and your parents, very sensibly, wish you to make your education your first thought. There will be time enough for "movies" and boys a year or two from now. A young girl needs the protection of a good home and careful parents; she is doubly fortunate when she has these—which are much better for her than anything the streets, "movies" or dance halls can offer.

BROWN EYES, Andalusia, Ala.—It would be the best sort of plan, if the weather permitted, for you to place on the veranda some of the tables used at your party. It would be correct for you to aid in the serving of your refreshments—which may be suitably placed on the separate tables you suggest. You should ask two or three of your most intimate girl friends to assist you in serving your guests.

A. B., Willisburg, Ky.—The bride's glove is not removed, but is turned back over her wrist so that the wedding ring may be conveniently placed upon her finger. (2) The bridesmaid is supposed to care for the bouquet of the bride.

M. K. P., Hollis, Okla.—The best sort of frock for traveling would be one plainly tailored of brown tweed or homespun. With this wear a small close-fitting hat to harmonize with your suit. A sailor of brown straw would also be appropriate. Any purse or handbag you may carry should be made of brown leather of a shade to match your frock. (2) Fortunately, "picture hats" are not much worn nowadays—and certainly not by "college graduates," as you seem to think. A "picture hat" is a wide-brimmed, expensively-made millinery concoction and is most properly seen, if ever, at formal luncheons of a kind where pearl necklaces may be also in order. You ask more questions than our regulations permit us to answer.

R. H., Hettinger, N. D.—This boy had no reason to show displeasure because you accepted another boy's supper invitation during the dance. He should have asked you earlier, or taken you to the dance, if he wished to have any prior claim on your company. We should regard him as an ill-mannered suitor who needs to be taken down a peg or two.

G. I., White Lake, S. D.—Of course you must not meet secretly any man whom your parents object to your receiving in your own home. Such conduct is disobedient and dishonest and can only result in trouble and unhappiness. (2) You can only be certain that a man cares for you "more than as a friend" if he tells you so. And we regret to say that this rule is not without many exceptions—man being a most fickle creature and lips being more easily stirred than hearts.

SAD AND LONELY, Princeton, Ky.—A boy is supposed to be able to care for his own hat, and a girl should not hold his headgear for him. (2) It makes absolutely no difference which speaks first—the boy or the girl.

B. R., Rockaway, N. J.—Regardless of the length of your absence, you may take a small trunk if this is more convenient than a suitcase. (2) You may tell a caller where he may place his hat, but you should not take it from him.

L. B., Jamestown, N. C.—It was correct for you to ask the young man to remove his arm which he had placed about you when driving.

D. L. S., Brattleboro, Vt.—When a man who is accompanied by a lady meets another man, it is correct that the men raise their hats in greeting each other. (2) The "third finger of the left hand" upon which the engagement ring is placed is not the middle finger but the one next to the little finger.

E. S., Benhams, Va.—A girl may say anything which seems suitable at the time when a man is introduced to her. Usually the one making the introduction says something which may be used to "break the ice." (2) It makes no difference who speaks first after an introduction.

M. D., Winston-Salem, N. C.—A girl should not write a letter "introducing herself" to a boy. Wait until some friend can properly present this boy to you.

BLUE EYES, Oxford, N. C.—This boy's class or college pennant should not be hung in your parlor, although you may have it placed on the wall of your own room if you wish.

sagging gate, poorly kept lawn, an unpainted shed, or tin cans. Last week we came through the prettiest little timbered village, on a river's bank, but junk was strewn along the streets, paper and rags were blowing around, and how I did want to stop and appeal to the little boys to form a "Booster Club," and make that town look like the others we came through, but I can't do such things. I write better than I talk. Tell all your boys about it and make some badges for them and you will be surprised how much they can and will do. Our kiddies have picked up and burned every scrap of paper that blew near our path, from S. Dak. to Kansas.

We found many beautiful flowers enroute, and saved a slip of cactus from each state. They were all different and the Kansas cactus has a large orange and yellow blossom.

So far we have seen only one covered wagon. Even the gypsies have cars nowadays, but we have had to help some of the cars through the ruts and too, we can boil and bake in our little range as we move along. In that wagon were an old, old couple—over eighty I should judge—and the man was an old soldier. We had a guest that day, also an old soldier of eighty-odd years, and we rested the horses and listened to the greeting and old-time tales that passed between those two comrades. It was interesting indeed. Our old man had been robbed of his money and pension papers, and the Government could not give him new ones for six months, for some reason. He had had no food for hours so we fed him bread and milk, a little at a time, until he seemed stronger. I wanted to take him to a Soldiers' Home but he was afraid of them so we took him as far as we went on his way, and I gave him the little wad of money I had been saving for chickens. I had rather never have another chicken than to have let him go that way. He is too old and feeble to work and I am sorry we didn't keep him with us. If he or anyone knowing him sees this, write me, at Kimball, S. Dak., and we'll give him a home—such as it is—until he gets help, for we too may be old some day—hope so for I don't feel a bit like kicking the bucket—and we need a grandfather anyway. He was going to Militare, Neb.

For a week back we have been on a trail called "The Golden Belt," I suppose because of the golden grain fields it passes through. It is very rich soil and a part of Kansas worth seeing.

Thank you for the many letters sent me. I can't answer all, but will do my best.

Did I tell you about our circles? I chose twelve sisters who lived far apart and numbered them. No. 1 wrote a letter to No. 2, who added some more and sent it to No. 3, etc. When they came back to No. 1 she removed her first letter, added a new one, and started the ball rolling again. We sent pictures, recipes, news, market prices, etc., and kept in touch with the country from coast to coast. It is great fun but if any of you get up such a circle I'd advise you not to put in anything of value as two of our circle packages went astray and I lost several pictures and crochet patterns that I wished to keep.

Sonny built a wonderful bridge and I sat on it. Just now it tipped the ink bottle, my ink and me into the dark Kansas soil, and I'm trying to remember how to remove ink spots.

I will have mail forwarded from Kimball, S. Dak., as "I don't know where I am going but I'm on my way.

Sincerely, PEARL VESEY.

Pearl.—Some time I'm going to pack my thread and needle and thimble and go Out-where-Bill-lives and sit around and wait and maybe he will lose a button and ask me to sew it on for him and thus I'll become acquainted with him. Wasn't he a lucky person and aren't you both fortunate to have met each other? Write again and tell us more about your interesting trip.—Ed.

WESTERNHEIM, N. DAK.

DEAR COMFORT EDITOR:

Yesterday (June 30th) when my mail came, dear old COMFORT was handed to me. I opened it and found my letter in it and read the footnote at the bottom, your own words. You asked if "seconds" of fruit would be appreciated. They certainly would and yesterday I got a box of delicious cherries and before that I had three packages of dried apples, peaches and prunes sent to me. They were fine. My worst trouble is that so many of the dear COMFORT sisters send me packages of fruit, clothing, papers and even money and sign only their initials and some parcels have the names entirely erased before they reach me. In the last three weeks I have had over 600 letters in all and they still come. Yesterday's mail brought me 66 letters and three packages of clothing with the addresses so blurred that I can't thank the senders, and I am trying to find these "givers" through COMFORT. My big girls,

Have Beauty Without Effort

Let Stuart's Calcium Wafers Do the Work to Rid Your Face of Pimples and Such Blemishes.

Instead of those futile efforts of steaming the face massage, creams, lotions, etc., that have brought only disappointment, suppose you leave it to the wonderful action of calcium.

There is but one way to remove pimples, blackheads, and such blemishes—through the blood and skin. In Stuart's Calcium Wafers, taken at meals, the wonderful calcium serves to supply the blood with one of the most remarkable actions known to science. This is its activity in keeping firm the tiny fibres that compose even such minute muscles as those which control the slightest change of expression. It is this substance which acts upon the skin, keeps it healthy and drives away impurities. Get a 60-cent box of Stuart's Calcium Wafers at any drug store.

DON'T STAY GRAY.

Neglect, nearly as often as age, brings on hair unloveliness. If from either or both causes your hair is turning gray, getting thin, brittle and scraggly, you should at once begin using KOLOR-BAK which quickly brings back natural color to gray hair. Results will astonish you! Improvement from first application. Two applications guaranteed to banish dandruff. Not in any sense a dye or stain but a scientific preparation that restores gray hair to original color by stimulating production of the microscopic pigments which give hair its natural color. So don't waste your time with mussy, greasy, muddy hair dyes and stains. They do no lasting good and may injure the scalp. KOLOR-BAK is clean, colorless and stainless. Easy to apply. Puts scalp in clean, healthy condition, free from itching; makes it cool and comfortable. Write for book giving proof and facts about our wonderful FREE TRIAL offer. Money back if Kolor-Bak fails. Hygienic Laboratories, 3334-3338 W. 38th St., Dept. 1053, Chicago.

A New Log Saw

Cuts Faster, Costs Less, Makes More Money for Users and Works While You Rest.

A new improved power log saw, now being offered, outdoes all other log saws in cutting wood quickly and at little cost. A new 4-cycle, high power motor equipped with Oscillating Magneto — no batteries to fail you — makes the saw bite through logs faster than other log saws. It finishes its cut and is ready for another before the ordinary saw is well started. This log saw —the Ottawa—has a specially designed friction clutch, controlled by a lever, which starts and stops the saw without stopping the engine. Others have imitated, but no other power log saw has this improvement just like the Ottawa. The Ottawa Log Saw sells for less money than any power saw of anything like its size.

The Improved Model, 4-H. P. Ottawa Log Saw.

One man wheels this outfit from cut to cut and log to log like a barrow. Separate attachments cut down trees and cut up branches. Extra power lets the engine do heavy work of all kinds. Owners of the Ottawa Log Saw laugh at coal shortages and are making big money with ease, the machine doing the work. 35 to 50 cords cut any day, rainy or dry, by one man, are normal figures. And wood is approaching $20 a cord! The Ottawa is compact, simple and durable. It sells for cash or easy payments and is guaranteed. If you have wood to cut the Ottawa Log Saw will be the most satisfactory machine you've ever owned. We suggest that you write the Ottawa Mfg. Co., 914 Wood St., Ottawa, Kas., for their complete new illustrated book and prices, sent free to all readers of this paper.

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not related to the special departments elsewhere in the paper will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

MRS. J. HOSLER, Allen, Pa., is in search of a book entitled the "Life Story of Lawrence Dennis." We have never heard of this work. Perhaps some COMFORT reader can aid and will write to Mrs. Hosler.

W. F. T., Kiser, Tenn.—The owner of a pleasure car cannot carry passengers for hire in his automobile without securing a proper license.

G. D., Thomasboro, Ill.—The Federal Government would have no provision applying to the support of yourself and family. Under our system of government all such relief is furnished locally.

K. B. S., Winfield, Texas.—We do not believe that as a commonsense reader of COMFORT you can think it possible that anyone is buying canceled postage stamps and paying for them at the rate of one cent each.

A COMFORT READER.—Toilet ammonia is an inexpensive preparation which can be obtained from any modern drug store.

A. A. B., Cleveland, Tenn.—Science does not recognize the existence of such a mysterious mineral product as a "mad stone." There would be no authority, therefore, to whom you might submit your find for a test as to its curative powers.

B. L., Equality, Ala.—Any paint store would be able to supply you with what is known as "varnish remover." Use this upon your mahogany chairs which have developed an inconvenient sticky quality. After you have removed the present defective finish, we advise you to re-finish your chairs with a dull oil-rub process. You should be able to obtain the directions for this from the shop which sells you your varnish remover. This oil finish, which is much more handsome and suitable for your mahogany, will not be effective unless you have completely and most carefully freed your chairs of the defective varnish before applying the oil.

MRS. J. G. B., Waldron, Mich.—As we have often stated in this column, there is no truth in the claims made for so-called "mineral rods" which are said to have the power to locate hidden minerals. We would very much like to have you and other sanguine COMFORT readers become the finders of "gold and other things" such as you describe, but we can assure you that you will have to use other means than "mineral rods" to secure your wished-for wealth of treasure.

H. R., Newark, N. J.—You may secure a copyright for your book by addressing the Register of Copyrights, Library of Congress, Washington, D. C. An application and full particulars will be sent you. The fee will be a small one. Books of verse by young amateur poets are but a drug on the always crowded literary market. You could only obtain the publication of your effort by paying yourself for such printing and binding as would be needed. The cost of this would depend upon the size of your volume as planned, and the style of binding you might desire. You would have to consult printers for estimates.

W. A. B., Kensington, Ga.—Generally speaking, Colorado is a state of abundant sunshine, dry atmosphere and light rainfall. It is this climate which makes life in the state health-giving for many invalids who have tried European resorts without success. Although much of the land in Colorado will always be better suited for grazing than for other agricultural uses, the cultivated area of the state increases each year. The eastern section of the state—once an immense plain devoted solely to the raising of cattle—is now being gradually developed into a splendid agricultural section. There are 8,251,297 acres of vacant public land in this big and desirable state. This land would be unimproved and would necessarily be without buildings such as you suggest. There are ten U. S. Land Offices in Colorado to any one of which you might write for particulars. The most important of these offices would be those at Denver and Pueblo. Mrs. M. Dargin is the Register at the U. S. Land Office in Denver, and G. M. Dameron fills the same position at Pueblo.

MRS. A. C. B., Purdy, Mo.—Information regarding the plant known as swamp cabbage or skunk cabbage was published in this column in the July issue of COMFORT.

C. B. A., Clifton, Texas.—There would be but a slight premium on a three-cent piece of the date of 1851.

S. P., Perryton, Texas.—Gen. Cornelius Vanderbilt, perhaps the best known of that wealthy family, may be addressed at 57th Street and Fifth Avenue, New York City. John D. Rockefeller, who is of advanced age and consequently rather secluded and inactive, is best addressed at Pocantico Hills, N. Y. A letter sent to 26 Broadway, New York City, will find his son, John D., Jr.

MRS. T. D. L., Ark.—As near as we can describe it in print, the Spanish name Juanita is pronounced "Hwaneeta." The accent is on the second syllable and both a's have about the same sound as is gained by the same vowel in the English name Arnold.

MRS. A. L. E., Mabel, Minn.—There is no stone which you could cut with a knife for the purpose of carving statuettes or other articles. A small steel chisel would be much more suitable for any articles to be carved from stone. A soft wood, such as pine or cypress, would be the best material for you to try your amateur hand upon. All sculptors make use of clay, and you can find plenty of Minnesota schoolboys who will be able to point out to you spots where this simple earthy compound can be found. Any clay which is too dry may be reduced to the proper molding consistency by the addition of water. And as for putty, that can be purchased at any paint store—or made by the simple process of mixing powdered whiting with linseed oil and a little white lead.

M. H., Detroit, Mich.—We could not tell you how long a time might pass before the mining corporation you mention would declare a dividend. We can tell you, however, that Uncle Sam is paying prompt interest on his Liberty Bonds twice a year, and that they can be purchased now at figures netting about six per cent—which is a good enough rate of interest for anyone. And six per cent from the hand of our Government is worth many times this rate in the bush of newly-formed companies.

MRS. W. L. T., Baton Rouge, La.—Whether there would be any sale for your song poem after it had been set to music would depend upon the quality both of your words and the melody which had been furnished them. No company or individual would do any sort of musical composition without being fairly well paid. We do not believe you could expect to have what you wish done for any less sum than the prices you name as having been already quoted you. Whether you choose to pay such a price must depend upon just how badly you wish to place your composition before your friends—and a friendly or unfriendly public.

MRS. A. P., Callao, Mo.—Addres Street & Smith, who are publishers at 79 Seventh Avenue, New York City. Enclose a stamp for reply.

M. W., Stewart, Va.—A girl may be married at the age of twelve years in the state of Tennessee.

MRS. E. B. G., Militus, W. Va.—The U. S. Weather Bureau reports Florida as having the highest average temperature in the U. S.—this being 74 degrees. The highest monthly average is 81, the lowest is 64. The bureau records the greatest annual rainfall as 60.2 inches. Necessarily the winter climate of Florida is very mild and frost is of rare occurrence. An increasing number of tourists, fleeing the northern winter, come to the state each year. In any consideration of Florida it must be remembered that the entire state is practically level—the highest point being only 301 feet above the sea. This department regards Arizona or parts of New Mexico as offering superior advantages to health-seekers. We cannot give you the subscriber's address which you desire, but you can obtain interesting literature concerning Florida by writing to the office of the Florida East Coast R. R. at 120 Broadway, New York City.

The Modern Farmer

to go to seed. When once the alfalfa gets a start, it will take care of the weeds.

BE SURE TO INOCULATE.—Unlike corn and grain, alfalfa grows little nodules on its roots which are the homes of "germs" which help feed the plant. If these germs are not present in the soil you cannot succeed with alfalfa. How get the germs into the soil? Put them there by "inoculation."

There are two ways to inoculate soil. One is to get the germs for inoculating direct from your State Experiment Station or from the U. S. Department of Agriculture. They will be sent sealed in a bottle, with full directions as to how to inoculate the seed.

The other method is to get a wagon load of dirt from an old alfalfa field and spread it over the land. This dirt contains the necessary germs.

WHAT SOIL FOR ALFALFA.—Alfalfa will not grow well on poor soil. Neither will it grow on wet land, even Grimm. Alfalfa needs sweet, fertile, well-drained soil, free from weeds, and properly inoculated. These are a lot of things to think about at once, but without all these necessary conditions you cannot expect "Success with Alfalfa."

Questions and Answers

FEEDING RABBITS.—We are starting in the business of breeding tame rabbits with the object of feeding them for the market. Many people tell us different methods of feeding and we are at a loss just what to do. Can you give us any advice on the subject that can safely be followed? We know that many have had bad luck with tame rabbits and would like good guidance that we may escape the same disaster.

M. E. D., Conn.

A.—Our observations lead us to conclude that most of the failures with rabbits and Belgian hares have come from overcrowding, in-and-in breeding, failure to change the strain of blood frequently so that constitution may be maintained, lack of outdoor exercise and sanitary surroundings and proper and sufficient feed. It is of vital importance to start with strong, healthy stock. Do not buy or keep a single rabbit that sniffles or has a discharge from the eyes or nose. Such rabbits are afflicted with "snuffles" (coccidiosis) and that disease is practically incurable and the bane of the rabbit raising business. As to rations, give adult rabbits of medium size, hay three ounces; roots, eight ounces, and one to two ounces (dry) of a mixture of equal parts of bran, soy bean meal, or bean meal or pea meal or linseed meal or maize gluten, mixed together with sufficient water to form a crumbly mash. As to green feed, in summer an adult rabbit of medium size will consume from two to four pounds of fresh-cut meadow grass a day and during the midsummer months will require little else, but after August the grass should be supplemented until the full ration is reached in October. A mixture of any of the common garden vegetables may be given with advantage, but the vines of potatoes and runner beans should be omitted. Feed twice daily. Vary the food. Give mixed vegetable leaves; not one kind only at a time. Wet tea leaves are appreciated. Keep fresh water before rabbits at all times.

SALVEY BUTTER.—Our cow's butter is so oily that it is impossible to handle it. I have tried churning with the cream as cold as possible but cannot improve this condition of the butter. Please advise me what to do.

MRS. P. L. C., Hillsboro, N. C.

A.—Feed cottonseed meal, freely to help firm up the butter; also wheat bran and ground barley, rye, oats or gluten meal. If, on the contrary, cottonseed meal and hulls have been the major part of the concentrated feed, stop such feed entirely and give an entire change of feed. Obtain a "starter" from the local creamery man, or buttermaker, and take his advice as to temperatures for souring and churning in your district as he is acquainted with local conditions and so has had the necessary experience in such matters.

don't watch out. I do not care what you think, but I would like to get hold of and hang the men who poisoned your childish mind. Theoretically Bolshevism may mean majority, but as a matter of fact it means minority, for there are not a million genuine communists in all Russia. Actually Bolshevism means the rule of a couple of fiendish hell hounds and their merciless satellites and Chinese executioners. The man who says there is freedom in Russia lies. Russia is a military despotism, governed by pitiless tyrants who have thrown over every principle of socialism, democracy and all else that make for decency. Russia's Red soldiers go into battle singing "We have sent God into retirement." The Patriarch of the Russian Church who anathematized these fiends is a prisoner. Every man cannot be his own master. We are all interdependent and subject to law. Your doctrine is anarchy and anarchy is hell. Russia was trying to set up a democratic government when Lenine and Trotzky, unscrupulous fiends, paid agents of Germany, mad, crafty schemers, seized power. Instead of giving the people land, bread and peace, they gave them starvation and bullets. Russia under the Czar was heaven compared to what it is now and most of the peasants pray silently for the return of the "Little Father," their murdered Czar. When Mrs. Philip Snowden, wife of a socialist member of the British House of Commons, went to Russia, she was hailed as "Comrade," but when she began to ask searching questions she was called "Madam" and given the gate. The brilliant writer, Bertrand Russell, British radical and pacifist who was imprisoned during the war, after viewing Communism at close range wants none of it. He thought before he went to Russia, that Communism would solve the troubles of the world. He came back utterly disillusioned. When they have a political convention in Russia the Bolsheviki take control. The people for miles around who are disgusted with conditions and who want to vote are not even allowed to get on the trains. They have no secret ballot but vote by a show of hands. The man who fails to raise his hand in approval of the reigning terror is a marked man and soon a corpse. Russia is a land without religion, hope or morals. She has been broken on the wheel of a murderous fanaticism. Her Red Guards, led by German officers, may sweep all Europe and push civilization back a thousand years. Listen to this cry of desperation from a Russian patriot: "The workmen in factories, mills and other works are virtually prisoners and thousands of Red Guards play the role of overseers and force these unwilling wretches to toil. That kind of work never covers expenses. Russia is terrorized and dishonored, the church undermined and ridiculed by the official movies. All the savings of the country made during long centuries are plundered by a horde of criminals." What used to be the Empire of Russia is today but a huge madhouse, a country of graves. The leading socialists of the world recently had a meeting at Geneva and they condemned Bolshevism unmercifully. All the leading American socialists have withdrawn from the so-called socialist party in the U. S., which is simply a German-Jew combination. Now let me plead with every one of you who can scrape up the money to send to the Harpers Publishers, New York City, for a work by John Spargo, entitled "The Greatest Failure in All History." Spargo's work is compiled from Bolshevist official documents. Don't

Lump Jaw of Cattle

WHEN a lump apears anywhere upon the head, face, jaw, throat or even the neck of a cow, bull, steer or calf, it is common for the owner to jump at the conclusion that it is due to actinomycosis and therefore is true lump jaw. That often is erroneous, therefore a little exact information on the subject should prove instructive.

Actinomycosis takes its name from the Latin name of the ray fungus (actinomyces) which grows on grain seeds, hull, beard, leaves and stalks. The disease is not directly contagious. It is invasive, which means that the spores of the fungus are carried into the tissues by an infected seed hull, beard or other part of a cereal plant. It is not caused by contact of an affected animal with one that is sound. Neither is it spread by the air, or feed contaminated by pus from a lump jaw abscess. Such pus, however, conveys the disease infection to plants, such as grass or grain, and the spores then develop and are capable of causing the disease if they find entrance to wounds or abrasions of the skin of the head, or mucous membranes of the mouth. Often they enter at the root of a split or diseased tooth, or infect a wounded tongue, causing "wooden tongue," which usally is curable if taken in time.

Very many of the tumors, enlarged glands or swellings of the throat and jaw are tuberculous; therefore in all cases the first step should be to have the tuberculin test applied by a veterinarian. If tuberculosis is not proven present, the lump then should be dissected or sloughed out and then the animal should quickly recover. If the bones are badly involved, treatment seldom pays. It is unsafe to cut out a tubercular tumor in a cow stable. By so doing, the disease germs may be spread to well cattle. Do all operations on clean grass, by preference.

So long as lump jaw has not caused emaciation, ill-health and discharging sores which enter the mouth, the meat of an affected animal is not condemned by the veterinary inspectors in slaughter houses. If internal evidences of the disease are found, the carcass is condemned. The disease is not hereditary nor is it carried by the milk of an infected animal; but milk into which pus has fallen should, of course, be rejected. If a fat steer is seen to be developing the disease it should at once be killed for meat.

Treatment consists in dissecting out the diseased mass, cauterizing the wound and giving two or three drams of iodide of potash daily in water. Wooden tongue necessitates scarification of the hardened parts, followed by daily applications of tincture of iodin. The internal treatment with iodide of potash also is imperative. Where cutting cannot well be done, the mass may be deeply incised and a wad of absorbent cotton saturated with a 10 per cent solution of peroxid of chromium should be then packed into the wound and cotton or oakum inserted to hold it in place. It will soon cause sloughing of the mass and that should be followed by healing. Corrosive sublimate, arsenious acid, or a large crystal of sulphate of copper (bluestone) may be inserted in place of the chromium caustic. All such work should be done by a veterinarian. When one cannot be employed, good results often follow the proper use of a proprietary lump jaw cure.

REPLY.—If the horse has heaves there will be expulsion of gas from the rectum during spells of coughing, as well as escape of gas from the mouth.

CATTLE DYING.—Will you advise me what to do for my cattle. They are dying rapidly. First there is looseness of the bowels and in a day or two they become restless and unable to walk steadily. They strain as though there was a desire for movement of the bowels. Before death they become unconscious. They are in a good pasture and drink fresh well water from a trough. What is the matter and what can I do?

R. A. W.

A.—Hemorrhagic septicemia is to be suspected as the disease present, but an investigation and post-mortem examination would be necessary to a confident diagnosis. At once keep the remaining cattle off the pasture where the disease has occurred and have a veterinarian make the necessary investigation. If he finds the disease we have mentioned he should at once vaccinate against it. Lead poisoning would be another likely cause of such symptoms. Affected cattle show a blue line around the teeth some time before death. See that the drinking water is not contaminated in any way and that the cattle are not finding access to paint, or lead in any form.

ABNORMAL HOOFS.—I have a mule three years old and his hind hoofs grow so long that he walks on his hocks. I have had them trimmed but they soon grow out again. When they are trimmed he walks on his feet. Is there a cure? R. W. W.

A.—Founder often causes such abnormal growth of the hoofs; but it usually affects the fore feet. The joints you refer to are no doubt the fetlocks. The hocks are in the position on the hind legs corresponding to the knees of the fore legs. We should advise having the hoofs trimmed to proper proportions and shod. Then put the mule to steady work in harness and have the shoes reset every three or four weeks. Keep the mule on a dry floor. Wet or filth will tend to keep the hoofs soft.

ROARING.—I have a colt two years old. He had a cough last spring, and when it stopped and he laid down he held his breath and let it out with a groan.

MRS. J. R. L.

A.—We fear that strangles (distemper) has caused roaring (laryngeal hemiplegia), and if so that can only be remedied by a difficult and expensive operation upon the membranes of the larynx; or a veterinarian might insert a permanent silver tube in the windpipe. Take the colt to a qualified veterinarian, for examination. Possibly he may find some other cause of abnormal breathing, such as pus in the gutteral pouches, or growths (polypi) in the nostrils, and these conditions might also be relieved by operation. Without an examination we are unable, however, to give a perfectly confident opinion as to the exact cause of the condition described.

CONVULSIONS.—Will you tell me what was the matter with my calf? He was two months old and in perfect health one-half hour before death. The first symptom was whirling around to the left, then frothing at the mouth and bellowing. (2) I have a sow four years old that won't breed. She has had three litters. Will keep her from becoming pregnant? J. P.

A.—The calf died in convulsions or fits, and these commonly are induced by indigestion from overfeeding and lack of exercise. Apoplexy in fat calves is another possible cause. It leads to rupture of a blood-vessel in the brain, and that is fatal. A much more common cause, however, is too fast drinking of milk by a hungry calf. A spasm of the gullet results and convulsions may follow. (2) A change of food may help the sow. Turn onto good pasture. Stop feeding slop, but allow a little middlings, shelled corn and tankage from a self-feeder. Two or three times a week flush out her vagina with lukewarm water containing 30 grains of permanganate of potash to the gallon.

RINGBONE.—I have a horse that stuck a thorn about three or four inches above the hoof on one of the front feet. It broke off. I got part of it out. I had a veterinarian cut where it entered but he didn't find anything. I think a ringbone has developed. Can you tell what will cure him? T. H.

A.—We would advise clipping the hair from the entire hoof-head and blistering it two or three times at intervals of two or three weeks. As a blister, use a mixture of two drams each of cinlodide of mercury and powdered cantharides and three ounces of lard. Put it in for fifteen minutes, a little at a time, and then smear some of it upon the blistered surface. Tie the horse up short so that he will be unable to bite or lick part. Wash the blister off in 48 hours and then apply a little lard daily. If an opening forms and discharges pus, the veterinarian will have to treat it as a case of quittor.

STIFF HOCK JOINT.—I have a mare, sixteen years old, that is stiff in the knees of her hind legs, which are slightly enlarged. She is a splendid worker and in good condition. MRS. D. S.

A.—As the mare is well advanced in years and both hocks are affected, it is improbable that treatment will do much good. Try the effects of 10 per cent iodin petrogen or vasogen rubbed in once daily. If that does not suffice, use reducine according to directions given by the manufacturer. You can buy it at a drug store.

LAMENESS.—What is the trouble with my horse? He is lame in his left front leg. When he trots he hits the ground hard. His shoulder is sore if you touch or pinch him. MRS. J. C. W.

A.—We are unable to determine the location or cause of mysterious lameness without making a personal examination. If the shoulder is affected, the toe will be dragged and the horse will have difficulty in stepping over a sill or other obstacle. If the foot is thrust forward when the horse rests, the lameness is located there. If you are certain, however, that the shoulder is the seat of the lameness, it would be well to clip off the hair and apply a mild blister.

SLOBBERING.—I would like to know what causes horses to slobber and what is the cure for it. L. McG.

A.—Slobbering or salivation may be due to sharp or irregular teeth requiring the attention of a veterinarian. More often it is due to irritants in feed. White clover, for instance, is well known to cause slobbering, and feeding burdock leaves is a popular remedy. A solution of alum also is helpful and particularly so if there are ulcers on the lining membranes of the mouth.

let the Reds in this country fool you. Spargo in writing this great work was inspired by no other purpose than to tell the truth and prevent honest progressives from being the victims of the most damnable conspiracy to ruin and debauch the human race that was ever conceived in the mind of devils, who, if we are not careful, will plunge the whole world into a sea of anarchy while they and their mistresses riot in the palaces of the murdered Czar. P. S. Russia has nothing to export. Her peasants are robbed of their grain or it is "paid for" in worthless, dirty paper. Trotzky and Lenine are the world's champion profiteers, they have sucked dry the greatest country on earth. Bertrand Russell also said: "If Bolshevism were made universal, it would submerge civilization for a thousand years."

DALLAS, GA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am a single lady and am tired of a single life. I want a husband between 28 and 45 and apply to you, for there must be a man somewhere for me. I am ready to answer all letters and tell of my life and you hold my name and send letters to me. Good by, good luck. Thanking you for your kindness,

REDBIRD.

You boys and girls seem determined to make me a matrimonial agent, but you are wasting time, as I have told you a score of times, I am not in that business. Redbird, you would not be a real woman if you did not want to be a chimney star to a "sengall man." The young man of today does not marry because you girls have spoiled him. Dr. Hibben of Princeton recently repeated what I have already told you many a time: "There is no aura of mystery about woman today, nothing is left to the imagination." Men do not buy what they can get for nothing, and many of you girls have been far too free and easy in displaying whatever charms you possess, and in allowing man to put over on you what the great Spanish author, Blasco Ibenez, called "the cave man stuff." Some women like the knock down and carry out method of wooing but they forget that primitive man was a brute, a human gorilla, and the cave-man lover does not respect those who submit to his methods, and without respect love languishes and dies. You forget that the man who indulges in the cave-man stuff judges woman by his own standards, which are too often little higher than those of the jungle or the barnyard. He becomes satiated with conquest, and all the respect he acquired at the family hearth for womanhood soon vanishes. What was once the most priceless and dearest of human possessions has now depreciated and become as cheap as a Liberty Bond, and for the same reason—you have thrown the priceless

Comfort's Home Lawyer

Through the columns of this department subscribers may have free advice from our eminent legal adviser on all questions of law except divorce matters.

Address Home Lawyer, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

R. A., Alabama.—Under the laws of your state, we do not think the husband of the woman who died has any interest in the estate of his deceased wife's grandmother unless his wife survived her grandmother. (2) We think the signature of both the widow and children will be necessary to convey good title of the real estate belonging to the man who died, leaving no will.

K. S. P., Kansas.—If, as your letter indicates, your father is still living, we do not think you are entitled to any share of his property; we think if you survive him and he does not disinherit you by will, upon his death you will be entitled to a share of whatever property he may leave, after the payment of his debts.

J. C., Tennessee.—We think that almost every locality in this country provides for some form of public schools, but we do not think any public school in this country has a course of training for the stage.

M. W., Kentucky.—We are of the opinion that the value of the widow's dower interest in the land you mention would depend upon her age and probable length of life figured upon the life insurance tables; her interest is one third for life, and by taking one third of the value of the property and multiplying the income thereof, at a rate of interest fixed as reasonable by your courts, by the probable number of years she has to live as fixed by the life insurance tables, you can arrive at a fair value of her dower interest in the land. We think the land can be sold by the joint deed of the widow and all the other persons in interest.

Mrs. A. H., Ohio.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving a surviving widow and children or descendants, the widow would receive dower of a one-third interest for life in the real estate, and one half of the personal estate up to $400, and one third of the balance in excess of this amount, the balance of the estate going in equal shares to his children, the descendants of any deceased child taking the parent's share; if there be no child or descendant, and the property did not come to the decedent by descent, device or deed of gift, the whole property would go to the surviving widow; if the property came to the decedent by descent, device or deed of gift of an ancestor or former wife, the share of the surviving widow would be reduced.

L. L., Georgia.—We think you should employ some local competent lawyer to prepare your will for you and attend to the execution of the same; you should, however, if you desire your wife to have the whole property, be sure to appoint her sole executrix of such will, as the appointment of an outside executor would only create additional and unnecessary expense to the estate.

O. O. N., North Dakota.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving no child or descendant, the whole estate would go to his surviving widow if the same does not exceed in value the sum of $15,000; if it exceeds this amount, one half of such excess would go to the surviving widow, and the balance of such excess to the decedent's parents in equal shares or to the survivor if either be dead; if both are dead and the estate does not exceed $25,000, the whole estate goes to the surviving widow, if in excess of this amount, the widow would receive one half of such excess, the balance of such excess going to the brothers and sisters of their descendants, depending upon who is left.

E. W., Michigan.—If you can substantiate by the proper evidence that the man who purchased your hay released you from your contract, we do not think he can collect damages from you for your failure to carry out your contract; if you are unable to substantiate the fact that he released you from the contract, we think you are liable to him for such damages as he can prove he suffered by reason of your failure to carry out your contract with him.

H. H. F., Wisconsin.—We think the owner of the property you mention should have his deed to the property recorded before attempting to convey same.

Mrs. M. W. N., Oklahoma.—Under the laws of Arkansas, we are of the opinion that the statute of limitations bars actions for the recovery of real estate within seven years, with a saving clause of three years after removal of disabilities in favor of infants.

Mrs. F. L., Michigan.—As you will observe by reading the heading of this column, we do not give opinion in matters relating to divorces.

Mrs. C. B. D., Indiana.—Under the laws of Illinois we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving no child or descendant, the widow would receive one half of the real estate and the whole of the personal estate; if he leaves no kindred, the widow would receive the whole of the estate. In Indiana, if there is no will and no child or descendant, we think the widow takes the whole of the real estate if the same does not exceed $1,000 in value.

J. M. B., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion, (1) That your neighbor has no legal right to divert the natural course of the water running over his land in such a manner as to cause it to drain upon your land and damage your property. (2) That your neighbor has no legal right to take building stones from your property without your consent. (3) That your neighbor has no legal right to allow his chickens to trespass upon your property.

Mrs. V. E. C., Ohio.—We think there is a National Home for disabled volunteer soldiers at Dayton, Ohio, and State homes for disabled volunteer soldiers at Sandusky and Madison, Ohio.

Mrs. D. E. P., Missouri.—We do not think the omission of your middle initial in the deed of your property to you would invalidate your title to the property; we think, however, in conveying or mortgaging your property it would avoid confusion for you to sign your name in the same manner as it was recited in the deed to you.

M. A. S., Kansas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the signature of the specific legatee under the will of the man who died will not be necessary for the sale of the real estate devised in the residuary clause of the will, provided proper evidence is produced to show that the specific legacies have been paid.

Mrs. T. J. T., Texas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that all property acquired by the husband and wife by onerous title during the marriage is considered common or community property and upon the death of either party one half of such property goes to the survivor and the remainder to the child or children of the deceased; we think that a second wife would only share in the husband's share of the community property of a former marriage; we think that upon the death of the first wife the husband's share of the community property became his separate property and that upon his remarriage and subsequent death his widow would receive one third of his separate personal estate absolutely and a life estate in one third of his separate real estate in addition to her share of the community property of their marriage.

Mrs. E. M., Virginia.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if you were legally adopted under the proper judgment or decree of a proper court you would have inheritance rights in the estate of your foster parent, unless cut off by will or unless your adoption has been legally revoked.

Mrs. H. A. O., North Dakota.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving a surviving widow and more than one child, his widow, in addition to homestead rights, if any, and certain small allowances from the personal property, would receive one third of the real and personal estate, the balance going in equal shares to the children, the descendants of any deceased child taking the parent's share.

Mrs. E. M., Indiana.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a married woman holds her real and personal property and all the profits therefrom absolutely as her separate property, and they are not liable for her husband's debts, but she cannot alien or incumber her real estate nor enter into any executory contract therefor unless her husband joins in the conveyance or contract, but may sell her personal property without his consent; the separate deed of the husband conveys no interest in his wife's land. We do not think the husband can acquire any interest in his wife's separate property through a divorce action.

C. A., Kentucky.—We think it will be necessary for you to ascertain the location of the mining claims in Alaska left by your uncle, before you will be in a position to learn whether they have any value.

C. H. B., Georgia.—We think that an examination of the title records of the property you mention, and a knowledge of the facts in connection therewith will be necessary to determine the validity of the title conveyed by the deed you mention.

Mrs. E. M. Y., Indiana.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the rights of the widow against the children, where the husband dies without a will, are $500 in goods or money and in addition thereto, if two or more children survive the husband, the wife takes one third of the real and personal estate absolutely; if one child survives, the widow takes one half absolutely; provided, however, that if all the children surviving are children by a former wife, the children are the "forced heirs" of the widow, and she cannot alienate her interest so as to prevent these children from inheriting it from her; and provided, further, that real estate descending to a widow is rendered inalienable during her life by her remarrying while any of the children or descendants of the marriage by which she received the real estate are living, unless the children or the descendants, when of full age, join in the deed.

J. F. T., Texas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if your mother's will has been legally probated, and no contest of the same is pending, your interest in her estate is limited to the $1 left you in the will, and your signature is not necessary for the sale of her real estate.

Mrs. M. J. B., Kentucky.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that children born to a woman lawfully married and living with her husband are presumed to be legitimate.

Mrs. A. G. D., Alabama.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that you cannot compel your husband to return the property you turned over to him; we think you can, by will, reduce his interest in your estate, in case he survives you, but you cannot bar him from receiving a share in your real estate.

Mrs. B. P., Arkansas.—If the terms of your lease provided that the tenant was to plant, attend to and harvest the crop for a stipulated share therein, we think he should attend to the harvesting, but that, of course, is dependent upon the terms of your lease, and you supply no information as to that.

Mrs. E. L. D., Texas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of your stepfather, leaving no will and leaving no child or descendant, your mother, if she survives him, will receive all the community property and all of his separate personal property and one half of his separate real estate; in case she predecease him, we think her children by a former marriage will receive her share in the community property, but will have no other inheritance rights from his estate, unless some provision is made for them in his will.

Mrs. G. W., Wisconsin.—We think it is customary to allow a few minutes, after the time stated in a notice calling a school meeting in a country district, before proceeding with the meeting in case all the members are not present at the time set for the meeting.

B. F. C., Arkansas.—We do not think marriages between first cousins are forbidden in Alabama, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Idaho, Kentucky, Maine, Massachusetts, New Mexico, New York, North Carolina, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Texas, Virginia and Washington.

Mrs. H. I. L., Kansas.—We do not think it matters who drew your renting agreement if the same is drawn to properly protect your interests; we think if you have your lease recorded, any purchaser of the property would have notice of your prior claim on the property.

J. A. B.—In some states, we think women acquire all property rights upon their marriage before arriving at full age, but we do not think this rule is extended to males.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

Violet, seventeen years old and Della, sixteen, are at home for a few days on their vacation and we've all three written letters of thanks for all parcels received and answered 465 letters besides and we are still doing it, with the exception of those parcels that contain no addresses or dimmed ones. We have mail three times a week at our little Westerheim post office and I've had more than a wagon box load of reading matter sent me and probably two or three wagon boxes full of clothing. I hope the sisters won't lay it up against me for not thanking them for goods sent as we tried our level best to thank all.

My boys, Howard, thirteen years and six months, is our sheep herder, Norman, six and one half years, Eugene, four and one half years and Eloise, eighteen months, are our other children and they received clothes through the mail and new cloth besides.

Prospects look better for a crop this year than they have for four years but we are so far behind that I'm afraid we'll never catch up again.

I certainly enjoyed the COMFORT sisters' letters and am saving every one to reread next winter when blizzards come. I do hope those who sent me money or parcels and received no letter of thanks will see this letter in print and understand why I did not write to them. I wouldn't be ungrateful enough not to express my gratitude in writing if I had a chance.

Whenever the mail comes and we start opening "bundles," the three little children just swarm around and can hardly wait to see if there is candy, gum, playthings or shoes or some other article of dress for them. They think Santa Claus comes every day of the week now.

I think the COMFORT sisters are properly named. I'd just love to shake hands with all those dear friends. The paper, stamp and envelope for this letter was furnished by them. We've had many nice meals, with dried fruit made into sauce, that otherwise would have been pretty bare, for many times all we had was bread and gravy or Johnny cake and milk or some very simple thing.

Thanking our dear Editor and COMFORT sisters once more I'll begin answering letters again.

EDITH WAIT MELLIS.

Mrs. Mellis.—Look again and maybe you'll find a typewriter and a stenographer, with notebook and pencils, in the bottom of the largest package. You will need one if you have over 600 letters to answer. Isn't that a glorious proof that we really are one big family?—Ed.

ST. JOSEPH, Sta. A, Box 64, Mo.

DEAR SISTERS:

After reading E's letter in April COMFORT I could not refuse to enter the corner again even though I had promised not to. And that promise evoked a storm of protest from all points of the compass, but these protests would have looked better had they appeared in the corner rather than to me, personally. I'll bet Bachelor Bill says I never got them.

Now to answer E's question. E, you answered your own question when you said, "Probably this feeling against the divorcee depends on the circumstances which brought about the divorce." Most assuredly it depends entirely upon the circumstances. Men, I'll admit, are inclined to look rather askance at the divorcee but where the cause of the divorce is not the fault of the woman I think they may have the same respect for her as for one who has never been married. You did not give us any of the circumstances connected with your separation from your husband, consequently it is a bit hard to advise you. However, when the right man comes along who truly loves you, you will find the fact of you being a divorcee will make no difference to him. But don't make a recluse of yourself and don't be morbid. Go out and enjoy yourself and don't think that you need to blush for the making of one mistake. If the man was unworthy, don't let his unworthiness wreck or embitter your whole life. The best of men are unworthy a pure girl's love but you seem to have chosen one of the kind that is not even appreciative so just forget all about it and him and be more careful

Baby Betty

Reward No. 7595

Beautiful Lifelike Sleeping Doll Given For A Club Of Only Five!

BETTY is a darling—one of the handsomest, sleeping dolls ever created. She is over a foot tall, with an unbreakable bisque head, strong, durable, stuffed body, deep blue eyes that open and shut, rosy lips and glossy brown hair that clusters in curls about her pretty face in a most charming manner. Her round, plump cheeks and hands are tinted a natural flesh color and her head, arms and legs are movable, being jointed at the neck, shoulders and hips. Our illustration shows you how childish and lifelike "Baby Betty" looks in her cute dress and with a real stocking cap perched jauntily on her brown, curly head.

Children go into raptures over this new sleeping doll wherever it is seen, so we decided to purchase a quantity and give them as rewards to our own little girls whose mothers are COMFORT readers. We could not secure very many of them owing to unsettled labor conditions and ever-increasing prices and we are not sure that we can get any more so please send in your club-order at once.

Our Free Offer! For a club of only five one-year subscribers to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you this beautiful, life-like, sleeping doll—"Baby Betty"—free by parcel post, prepaid. Reward No. 7595.

The Family Doctor

The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be taken to your local doctor.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

MISS M. B., Hildreth, Nebr.—The blood should have a rather dark red color and coagulate readily. If your blood is light red in color, you are probably anemic and need an iron tonic. There is no better tonic for the blood than Basham's mixture. Take one tablespoonful after meals, well diluted. This preparation must be made fresh by your druggist, as it loses its character if not put up fresh and also kept in a cool place.

MRS. J. D. S., Dutton, Ala.—Change of climate is the one best remedy for asthma. The other, that has been exploited as a cure or remedy, is a combination of thyroid extract and adrenal extract with nuclein. Of course this treatment must be begun and followed up by your family physician.

MISS O. S., Maysville, N. C.—The best way to cure your catarrh is by having your tonsils and adenoids removed at once, and then spray the nose and throat with Dobell's solution three times a day. You will have to remain in the hospital for a week probably after the operation and can have the superfluous hairs removed at the same time. The electric needle is the only way to permanently remove the hairs.

MRS. M. M., Horte, Mont.—For your stiffness of limbs, joints, etc., the best remedy is massage daily. A cool douche to the spine, with a brisk rub after the douche, is also indicated. As a tonic you might try Basham's mixture in tablespoonful doses, well diluted, after meals.

MR. A. F. M., Saltillo, Ind.—Apply to the rash on body a saturated solution of aluminum acetate. There is no preventive medicine for poison ivy.

MRS. S. R. T., Mt. Washington, Mo.—For your lassitude, take one teaspoonful of Warburg's tincture three times a day after meals. This remedy will help you and remove your gloomy forebodings, complained of.

MISS A. K., Fries, Va.—There is no danger in having moles removed in the proper way. Chemicals should not be used in any case; but the actual cautery is to be preferred in every case. Removed in this way, there is no danger from a new growth and the result is more than satisfactory as to scar and from every standpoint.

MRS. V. B., Tip, Okla.—Some "cross-eyes" can be straightened by lenses or glasses only; if lenses do not correct the defect, then an operation is indicated in every case, almost, except possibly in paralytic squint. Even in cases of paralytic squint, in many cases an operation will correct the convergence or divergence, and make the cometic effect almost perfect. Operation for strabismus can be performed at any age, the success of the operation depending, of course, on the skill of the operator.

MRS. J. D., New York City.—For the insomnia, try a hot foot bath just before retiring. Use the bath as follows: Stand in hot water and at the same time spray the spine with a cold spray and immediately dry the body with a rough bath-towel, rubbing the body severely in order to bring the blood to the surface all over the body. In this way you draw the blood to the surface and away from the brain. Go to bed immediately after finishing the bath, which should only require about five minutes to accomplish. You might also take, on retiring, a ten-grain tablet of bromide of soda. Of course you must avoid tea and coffee at night, and possibly during the day, as well as other stimulants.

MRS. F. P. O., Peru, Nebr.—Do not interfere with the growth on your husband's forehead, but consult some good surgeon and have it removed by the electric cautery. Chemical cauteries are always inefficient and more or less dangerous. Besides, they leave a more or less disfiguring scar.

MISS C. L. D., Plattsburg, Mo.—For the excessive fat and size of breasts, try the diet so often mentioned in COMFORT. Skimmed-milk diet.—On alternate days drink one glass of skimmed milk, four times a day, only. Let this be your only food and on the other days live on a simple diet free from starchy foods. This diet will reduce you in every way.

MISS M. S. B., Ashboro, N. C.—For the watery and muco-purulent discharge from the nostrils, use Dobell's solution three or four times a day. Use the solution in an atomizer, and spray the nose often. Do not "snuff-up" the solution in the nose; use only as spray.

MRS. J. B. B., Cape May, N. J.—Your trouble is of malarial origin and the best remedy for you is fluid extract of eupatorium. Take one teaspoonful of the fluid extract, well diluted, after meals. Of course for the present and some time to come eat only such foods as you are sure will agree with you.

"Pink Cheeks" or pale cheeks will get no answer to their queries if they do not conform to the rules of this department. Kindly note that all letters must be accompanied with the address and full name of writer. However, as the request seems urgent, the best way of getting rid of the mole is to have it removed by use of the actual cautery in competent hands. This is a sure way and will not leave any scar.

MISS M. H., Raymilton, Pa.—Continue the urotropin tablets as heretofore and have the bladder washed out. For this purpose have your doctor use a solution of permanganate of potassium. Strength should be about a teaspoonful of a saturated solution to a pint of hot water. Use the douche every day for a short time.

MRS. A. L. B., Sellersberg, Ind.—Lassar's Paste can be obtained at any drug store of repute, as it is an official remedy.

MRS. B. P., Jersey City, N. J.—Have your daughter's throat and nose re-examined for adenoids and enlarged tonsils. Probably she has adenoids remaining which were overlooked at the first operation. Besides, the adenoids must have been reproduced since her first operation. This is possible and has occurred in several cases on record.

You have given no address, so this will have to appear in COMFORT instead of sending a reply directly to you as requested. No name or address: The operation for appendicitis has had no effect of the enlargement of neck or busts. You may be anæmic, need rest, so would advise the taking of ten drops of iodide of potassium syrup well diluted after meals.

MRS. C. E., Leesville, La.—Keep the bowels regular and apply, locally, to the piles compound gall ointment.

MISS L. E., Rule, Texas.—Get Dobell's solution and also liquor antisepticus, mix them half and half and use as spray and gargle. You should use this mixture three or four times a day, indefinitely, for your throat and nasal catarrh.

MRS. J. S., Phila, Miss.—You must have your eyes examined for any defect in sight. In many cases all your symptoms come from the need of proper glasses—eye-strain. For tapeworm use male fern. This remedy is dangerous and must be used only on and by the advice of your family doctor.

MRS. J. L., Oakland, Cal.—Apply to the throat a mustard plaster at night. Keep the plaster on only four or five minutes, just long enough to redden the skin. You might also take some good tonic, such as Basham's mixture. A tablespoonful after meals, well diluted.

MRS. J. M. S., Wainright, Okla.—Exercise and diet will help your circulation and have a marked effect on the dark lines under your eyes.

MRS. G. R., Oak Harbor, Ohio.—Have your son operated on for adenoids and tonsils at once. This will help, if not cure, him.

MISS E. L. I., Laverne, Okla.—You must consult an eye specialist and have your eyes fitted with proper lenses. If you do not do this your eyes will be permanently injured.

What is the difference between the death of a sculptor, and a barber? The barber curls up and dies. The sculptor makes faces and busts!

Comfort Sisters' Corner

in the future. Now, sisters, while we're on the subject let's discuss it among ourselves. As E says, being a divorcee is a position every girl is ashamed to be placed in but after all isn't it largely your own fault that you are so placed? Didn't you know that your husband was "a little wild" before you married him? That he had a glib tongue and could talk for an hour without saying anything, and that point appealed to you, didn't it? And he had plenty of nerve, was not timid in the least and simply could not be discouraged. It never occurred to you that that kind of a man was nothing but a conceited puppy and after having won you he would soon tire of you and sigh for other hearts to conquer. A true, manly man is aware of his own unworthiness and does not try to carry a girl's heart by storm but feels tongue tied in the presence of his adored one; and so the puppy usually wins, and the next thing is the divorce court.

Winnie, Aucilla, Fla., I have a notion to go down there and spank you. You surely are the most teasing little pest I ever heard of. Next time you write sign your full name and address or I won't read it.

Thanks and many of them for your good letters, sisters. Sorry I couldn't answer every one personally but that is impossible. I will be glad to call occasionally if Sister Wilkinson does not expressly forbid me. As she refrains from even commenting on my visits I feel like the man at the party who was welcomed by the guests but ignored by the hostess.

Best wishes, from your brother,

GEORGE L. GARRISON.

George.—Reading letters constitutes, in my mind, a handshake of welcome so I haven't ignored you. The only reason I haven't made further comments on your visits is that you were so very popular I didn't have the courage to push my way through the crowd of sisters surrounding you. Any way, I'm glad you are with us, even if I get only an occasional look-in.—Ed.

GRAHAM, MONT.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I am writing to you for the first time. I don't see many letters from Montana girls. It must be that they are too busy.

I would like to have the song, "Mother Is in Heaven," if some one will send it to me. Mrs. Wilkinson has my address.

I am only thirteen years old. Am I too young to be a sister?

Here are a couple of poems that I hope Mrs. Wilkinson will use:

To a Five Dollar Bill

"Crinkle, crinkle, little Bill,
Goodness gracious you look ill.
Are you losing all your power?
You look weaker hour by hour."

Bill

"Now prices are so high,
I'm so tired I could die.
I just circulate all day,
No one dares put me away."

"And no matter where I go
People disgrace me so.
I don't seem to count for much,
'Mong the profiteers and such."

The Person

"Bill, take heart, your luck may change,
I'll admit the times are strange,
Though you're weak, I love you still,
Crinkle, crinkle little bill."

"There was a crooked man,
He walked a crooked mile,
He found a crooked nickel
Against a crooked stile.
He smiled a crooked smile,
And winked a crooked eye,
Says he, You may stay there,
For there's nothing you will buy."

MISS R. P.
OHIO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

My daughter sends COMFORT to me and I enjoy reading the sisters' letters. I am a worried mother and coming for advice. I have seven children and the next to the youngest, a boy of thirteen, worries me so much. He does not want to go to school any more, although he always did well in his studies. He is in the seventh grade. We have recently moved to a community where all the boys have a deck of cards and play. He wants to play at home and as I have never allowed cards played in my house I don't feel like having it done. He says he will go elsewhere and play. I have a horror of cards, knowing the trouble they have caused. Will you please tell me whether I am doing right or wrong in not allowing him to play at home?

Best wishes to Mrs. Wilkinson and the sisters.

MRS. G.

Sisters, what advice are you going to give Mrs. G.? What did you do in a similar case or what would you do if it were necessary for you to make such a decision? Any helps as to how you keep your children interested in school work or home entertainment would be of benefit to many mothers.—Ed.

NEW JERSEY.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Her Two Suitors

and with Kenneth Cameron's laughing eyes fixed upon her?

"I shall be very glad of your congratulations when the betrothal is announced," she said quietly.

Kenneth took possession of her after that, and drew her for just a moment into the dimly lighted, flower-scented conservatory.

"That was heavenly of you!" he exclaimed. "You look so lovely I simply could not keep it to myself, and I was so afraid you would disown me that I was paralyzed. Let me thank you! Let me show you how passionately I worship you!"

He took the sweet face between his hands and kissed it, kissed it for the first time full upon the lips warmly, lingeringly.

She looked into his eyes without reproof and he slipped his arms about her.

"It is done, Dorothy, at last! Without Rudolph's consent! You are mine, my very own! I have no further fear!"

Once more he pressed his lips upon hers, and then she slipped away from him.

He made no effort to follow, but returned to the drawing-room, but too willing that his guests should share his happy secret, while she slipped out into the grounds.

She knew them already quite as well as he, having lunched there on several occasions with him and Madam Delpre, not to speak of the occasions upon which she had visited it before his return.

She remained for a time out in the garden where she could cool her hot cheeks and think what it was she had done.

There was no regret! She was only exultant that she had won the man who stood preeminent among his fellows.

Her ears had been open that evening, and she was not slow to see how he was regarded among men.

But she could not remain long away from the guests in that house in which she was not yet at home, and so, not desiring to make her return alone to the drawing-room conspicuous, she slipped through the library window which opened upon the balcony.

The room was dimly lighted, and as she entered she saw a shadow slink behind a portiere.

Knowing no fear, and really suspecting nothing wrong, she turned up the light and went directly to the portiere, pulling it aside.

To her surprise and horror she came directly upon a masked man.

She was about to scream out when a hand was clasped suddenly over her mouth and a voice which she recognized whispered in her ear:

"Be quiet! If you scream or attract any attention whatever, your hour is up! I won't kill you, but I'll do worse. These people shall know who it is that is masquerading among them as a lady! They shall know that she is the alleged daughter of Para, the lion-tamer, that she was a circus performer, traveling with Buxton's Circus for fifteen years. They shall know that she has no right to the name she bears, which is that of the man with whom she lived until she grew tired of him! Will you be quiet and let me get away?"

It was not needful that he should be unmasked. She knew Philip Hastings as well as if he had stood revealed before her, knew that he had entered the home of her future husband for the purpose of robbery! And she also knew that unless she would have that story of a disgrace and shame which Madam Delpre had innocently made her feel so keenly known to all the world, she must let him go unexposed.

She couldn't have spoken at first if her life had depended upon it, and as he ceased and released her she fell back against the wall helplessly.

Those people in there knew already of her betrothal to Kenneth Cameron. Could she face their scorn and his desertion?

"I have no desire—to—punish you!" she stammered. "Leave the house and I shall say—nothing!"

"That is sensible! I always thought you had more nerve than most women."

As he spoke he lifted a heavy traveling-bag from the floor and started from the closet into which he had stepped at her entrance. She caught at it convulsively.

"What have you there?" she gasped. "Do you think I will permit you to take anything—anything from this house? Leave that, Philip Hastings, and go!"

"Are you mad?" he sneered. "I have known of this ball for days and have bided my time, only I didn't count upon being discovered by you of all people. No, pretty one. You will have quite enough when you are the wife of the master, without these trifles. I am going to take them with me!"

"You shall not!" she cried excitedly. "Leave them, or—"

"Sh!" he whispered. "You are speaking too loud! Some one will hear you, and——"

"Then leave them and go!"

"No, I won't! You go back to your new swell friends and leave me to myself. I promise you that I will take nothing further."

"I'll do nothing of the kind. Give me that bag, do you hear? If you refuse, I will alarm the house. You shall be taken prisoner and——"

"You would never be such a fool. Do you think Kenneth Cameron would rather stand the shame of it than lose these few trifles, which are nothing to him, after all? They amount in all to less than his cigars would cost for one little week. Go to your friends!"

"Never! I——"

"Dorothy! Dorothy! Where are you, love? Oh, there you are! I have looked everywhere for you. What induced you to come to this somber old room? Why, you are trembling, sweetheart! Why?"

Philip Hastings had slunk behind the portiere into the closet among some old armor that had been rusting for ages.

He listened intently for her reply to Kenneth Cameron, who had called from the garden, then from the piazza, and had entered the room, crossing to her and taking her into his proudly possessive arms. And it came at last, that reply which meant so much to her after-life, the first step in the deception which she had willfully practiced.

"Nervousness, perhaps," she answered falteringly. "I shall be all right again when—when we are in the—the drawing-room with the others. Oh, Kenneth, have you told them?"

He looked down at her laughingly, and kissed her again while he drew her hand through his arm with a dignified air of proprietorship.

"Yes!" he said authoritatively. "Without Rudolph's permission, and you have called me 'Kenneth' without Rudolph's permission. Now it would kill me to lose you—now that I have looked upon you as all my own with no one's permission but your own—my love, my little, beautiful wife! Come, Dorothy! They are waiting in there for the enchantress."

They left the room and Philip Hastings came out of his hiding-place and watched them.

"I think you have fallen into a soft snap, my dear fellow!" he said to himself calmly as he lifted his bag and made his way from the room unseen.

which plainly reveals its name to every one.

My school is in the agricultural section of New Jersey, although dairying is extensively carried on. Silos are being put up rapidly by the progressive farmer. Poultry is with many people a specialty, too. Various lines of thoroughbred stock are seen on the different farms. Tractors are used and we are really becoming a "New West."

We are mid-way between Trenton and Easton, two progressive cities. We also enjoy several state roads which add much to the value and comfort of rural homes.

Those who are interested in schools and their needs may like to know of "our doings." Consolidation is agitated, and its present attitude is towards the proposition. We have a "helping teacher" who exerts her influence on the schools by giving positive suggestions. This supervisor is a broad-minded person, college graduate with ten or more years of previous experience, and meets with approval. Our pupils are given a chance to develop their thinking powers by what we call "Socialized Recitations." This meets with success, although many teachers do not approve of this method as discipline is more difficult, but where a teacher has full control of her pupils (I say her because men teachers are rarely seen in a country school), the results are far-reaching. Hot lunches are served in two thirds of the one-room schools. Preparation, cooking and clearing away is always done by older pupils, the teacher being in the background. Victrolas are used in many of our schools. They add to the charm of the schoolroom and are essential in teaching music and cultivating an appreciation for it. "Scarcity of Teachers," the "nation's cry," is a grave and serious situation that confronts us.

I shall leave my name and address with Mrs. Wilkinson and if any one wishes to correspond, I shall be glad to write.

BACHELOR GIRL.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I am going to you for sympathy and help and I hope our dear editor will print this. If she will I'll promise never to bother her again.

I am a girl of twenty-one. My mother is dead and I am living in town with my married brother and work in an office but I was raised in the country and coming to a strange city I am so lonesome. Sometimes I feel that I can't stand this life much longer. Of course I have made a few good friends while I've been here (a little over a year) but I want to find a place with some dear old lady as companion. I believe there is such a place among you that I could fill. I don't like public work at all but I think I could be happy if I could only find some such place. In losing my mother I lost my best friend. I have married brothers and sisters but no one to take her place. I have always wanted to be a companion or a child's governess and think I could do either if I had a chance. If anyone in this big band of sisters needs that kind of help, please write to me. I will leave my address with our editor.

RUBY.

KANSAS.

DEAR EDITOR AND ALL COMFORT READERS:

This is my first attempt though I've often thought I'd pay you a short visit. I enjoy your letters, dear readers, and once in a while there is a correspondent I'd love to have a quiet hour with. When E wrote I felt that I must speak.

Pearl Vesey, I read and reread your last letter. I feel as though you have suffered some of the bitter pangs of life but with your good hard-working husband and lovable children and your sunny disposition, the hardships would fly like the "nubbins."

Knot Head, about a year ago I made this remark to several ladies with whom I was spending a few hours: "I believe a woman will stoop lower to thrust a contemptible remark than a man," and to my surprise most of them agreed. I got my insight from various telephone conversations, so be careful, dear lady readers, how you bare your inner woman over a telephone line.

George Garrison to my mind you are preaching good sense. I have had some experience in voting; it so happened that my husband was of one political party and I of another and when the morning of election came he said to me: "Now you vote for Mr. So, and So for this and Mr. So and So for that." I listened carefully and he selected his whole party for me to vote for. I turned to him and said: "Now Mr. ——— I have lived with you for seventeen years and I have never meddled with your politics and you can't meddle with mine. You must expect me to look for principle and not party on either side." The curtain fell so kind reader don't let these trifling things come into your life; let each one do their own thinking and acting in politics. If you are of different views don't let a quarrel into the game; it isn't worth it, be fair to each other.

E, you expressed my situation and thoughts so much that I felt an impulse to answer. It was not politics that caused our separation. Never would I have allowed such a little matter as that to interfere. I feel that you are a real woman and I also think you are younger than I am. If your case was as justifiable as my own I see no reason why you should not attempt another home. Your neighbors know whether you are real or not. I married my husband with as pure a love and devotion as any girl ever did, counting on a home and all of home accompaniments and the joy of helping but after twenty years I met myself at the Cross Roads and it had to be. Divorce followed and to me if men criticize it is all right. I am cautious of some divorcees myself. There are too many hasty marriages.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have been reading many interesting letters in COMFORT and want to write and tell you a little about myself. I am twenty-seven years old and have been married ten years to one of the best husbands in the world. We both love children but have not been blessed with them. At present we are living with my father-in-law and get along pleasantly. I am not strong but am better than I have been for several years. I love farm life and lived there seven years and would be there had I had better health but the farm is no place

Complete Crochet Outfit Given

THIS offer is for the woman and girl who "loves her crocheting" and insists upon having the best of everything to work with. In this outfit we give you any desired quantity of Dexter Cordonnette "Silko" crochet and tatting cotton, and three of the highest grade crochet needles. There is no better crochet and tatting cotton than Dexter "Silko"—a fact already known to thousands of our women readers. It is made of the best Sea Island cotton with a twist that makes it lie flat, is highly mercerized and actually improves with washing. It is smooth to the fingers and will not kink. With Dexter "Silko," crocheting is more easily done—and the finished pieces are far more beautiful and useful than if made with cheaper grade cotton. Dexter "Silko" for crocheting comes in all the popular colors—white, ecru, pink, rose pink, light blue, delph blue, king blue, sapphire and sea green, and in sizes 3, 10, 30, 50 and 70. The tatting cotton comes in the same colors and of the size always used for this work.

The three steel crochet needles are the finest made, 5 inches long, nickel plated, perfectly formed and balanced, with flattened finger hold, and a nickel cap that slips on over the end, protecting it when not in use. This cap also prevents the sharp point from doing any damage when carried in the pocket, handbag or work basket. We give you three different sizes of needles—8, 10 and 12.

We believe that our crochet workers will appreciate this offer, as it means a considerable saving to be able to secure such an outfit as this without expense. We will send you this complete outfit, also additional quantities of the crochet and tatting cotton free upon the terms of the following special offers.

Offer No. 8563. For three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you the three crochet needles, one ball of Dexter "Silko" crochet cotton and three balls of Dexter "Silko" tatting cotton free by parcel post prepaid. Please be sure to give color and size wanted. Premium No. 8563.

Offer No. 8251. We will furnish you with extra balls of the crochet cotton at the rate of two balls for one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents, sent by parcel post prepaid. Please be sure to give color and size wanted. Premium No. 8251.

Offer No. 8261. We will furnish you with extra balls of the tatting cotton at the rate of four balls for one one-year subscription (not your own) at 50 cents, sent by parcel post prepaid. Please be sure to mention color wanted. Premium No. 8261.

A Little Convict of My Own

By Frances L. Garside

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

THE childless women of New York are divided fashionably into two classes: Those who put on spring styles in mid-winter, and those who know nothing about clothes save as a protection from the elements, but who lead in all sorts of altruistic schemes and reforms. The former are legion, but they are never interesting to any one but the dressmakers and tradesmen. The latter are always interesting, sometimes ridiculous, and invariably human. My friend whose enthusiasm plunged me into the affair was of the latter class.

She was the first woman in America to make a kit for a soldier in the European war, and as she is a spinster, and her acquaintance with man's needs is meager, we hoped the man who got it had a sense of humor. She was the first woman in New York to adopt a Belgian baby, and when she gave it up because it failed to thrive under her too enthusiastic care she took to psychic analysis to find out what ailed her soul. New York women of this class talk of the ailments of their souls as glibly as an Englishman talks of the diseases of his liver.

Then, after she had scoured her soul, she adopted a convict!

"You must adopt one, too," she said, brimming over with enthusiasm. "I will write to Washington and get a convict for you, one who needs special cheering up. It is the latest fashion in altruistic reform. After you have his address, you must write a weekly letter to him, putting sunshine into every word."

"But suppose——"

"I will find one for you who will take you out of yourself; one who needs the sunshine and encouragement of bright, cheery words! Think what it means to spend one's days and nights in a dark, lonely cell, eating out one's heart and coarse bread and no flowers, and never a magazine, or a ray of sunshine to brighten the midnight hours! Oh, it makes my soul sick."

"But suppose——"

"Suppose nothing. Think of his immortal heart-sick soul. Think of his empty, hungry, anguish-filled heart. Think of his lonesomeness."

The appeal to help one who is lonely was irresistible. I had resisted all her other philanthropic schemes. I fell for the convict, and a desirable one was at once applied for.

I had insisted that he be located a long way off. She found him in a cell in Texas. I had also insisted that he be sent up for life. If I had to adopt a man, I wanted him safely behind prison bars. She found a man serving a life term for killing his wife.

"But you mustn't refer to that," said my friend. "After all, that doesn't concern you."

I agreed with her. If it had been one of my own kin he had killed I might have the right (casually, of course, and in an off-hand manner) to mention it, or I might hint at it delicately in a postscript, but as he was no kin to me, and the superabundance of women is going to be the world's next big problem, I had no right to remind him of his ignorant attempt to solve it. He was a Russian, aged thirty-one, and had served ten years. He had killed his wife because she was untrue to him. This, at least, was more human than if he had killed her because she refused to be content with the backbone of the chicken, or had failed to sew on his buttons. It showed, at least, that he had a heart.

For many weeks the correspondence was conducted with great difficulty upon my part, and indifference on his. There was so much I could not say. I could not write of the past, and he had no more future than a rabbit in snow-time. The present is never interesting. I tried the weather, but after I had censored one letter till there was nothing left but "Dear Ivan, It is cold today," I decided such a letter wouldn't remind him of his soul, and tried poetry. Poetry, because no one reads it, is always safe. I sent him a poem about "The Spirit on Its Wings."

"Say," he replied, "do you take me for a school teacher? I don't believe I like this being adopted nohow."

Then one day, in desperation over my failure as a sunshine dispenser to his soul, I wrote him a funny little story. His reply astonished me; he said he had laughed, the first time since he was sent up. After that, I made a systematic collection of every funny story, joke and conundrum I could find, and for fear I might forget I carried with me a special notebook bound in stripes of black and white.

My methods of bringing sunshine into my ward's life were not approved by my friend. She said I failed to appeal to his soul. Undoubtedly I did, for never once did he write that my letters made his spirit soar.

Her convict wrote her:

"Your letters are an inspiration. They stir my soul to its profoundest depths. Dear Soul Mother, will you send me all of that poem by Shelley from which you have quoted the line, 'A star which moves not 'mid the moving heavens alone?'"

My convict wrote:

"Say, Miss, that was a good one about the cured ham that had a relapse, and, say, where did you get that about what we would see if Hell were turned upside down; "Made in Germany" on the under side. I laughed over that till I got called down something fierce in chapel. And say, we don't know anything about high prices in here, but it must be fierce outside if that is true about the woman telephoning to her butcher for a dollar's worth of steak, and telling him if there was no one home to poke it through the keyhole. Meat must be high if a dollar's worth can be poked through the keyhole. Do you know any more riddles? I'm right smart at guessing riddles."

My friend objected so strongly to the lack of uplift in my letters that in the next one I dropped a lot of beautiful sentiments I found in a book of poems. They were so inspiring I could eat no supper after writing them. To be hungry in such exalted moments is a vulgarity.

"Say, Miss," he replied, "Cut that. I hain't no Harvard graduate."

A stress of work caused my end of the correspondence to lapse, and after several months had passed, the letters ceased, and the affair dropped from my mind. One day there was a knock on the door. I opened it, and found myself facing the wickedest looking piece of humanity I had ever beheld. I can't describe him. I know I never saw a more brutal countenance.

"I want to see her," he said roughly, pushing his way by me into my parlor. He took a dirty envelope from his pocket, drew out a sheet of paper, unfolded it, and showed me my signature, over which were the words, 'Your guardian and friend.' "And I want to see her quick. None of your fooling now. Where is she?"

I looked from my signature to the address on the envelope. It was my convict! Then I took another look at the man and trembled.

"She—she—" I stammered—"is gone."

"I'll wait till she comes back. She's adopted me and I've come home. Say, has she any money?"

"She will never come back," I managed to say.

I suppose I looked overcome with emotion. I know I was never more frightened.

"You don't mean," he burst out with an oath, "that she is dead?".

I shook my head to give assent. I don't know what he replied; I know I had never heard such a string of oaths.

He got up to go. "That's just like you women," he said, with a curse, "to die just when you are needed. I thought I had struck it soft for life."

Then I collapsed.

Some one on that prison board in Washington had blundered, and instead of cheering a man sent up for life I had been scattering sunshine over a common thug with less than a year to serve.

My friend, to whom I told the story, laughed. She had forgotten all about her convict and was engaged in a wild search for her aura. I couldn't understand what she would do with it when she found it. But I was not surprised to learn that she had one and that it was very important that she find it.

Lots of New York women are just like that.

Six Aids to Beauty

By Madame Maree

Simple Methods, that Never Fail. Wonderful Results Noted in a Few Days, When These Helps are Used for Complexion or Hair.

A Lily Skin in a Few Days

THERE is but one thing you need to beautify your skin and bring it to a condition of incomparable loveliness in a short time. This has been used by thousands of women with extraordinary success. By the use of this you will soon find that all red spots, freckles, all muddiness and sallowness will have disappeared completely, leaving the skin pure and clear as a lily. You cannot get this result except by mixing yourself at home, in a very few moments, one ounce of zintone with a little glycerine and hot water. The zintone costs fifty cents at the drug store. This makes a remarkable cream, which, when used liberally, will not fail to give you the results.

Hair Stops Falling, and Grows

You can easily prevent hair from falling, and you can make it grow thick and luxuriant by a very simple method, which is far superior in results to that of any so-called hair tonic you can buy. You will notice the difference in your hair in a very few days, and it will take on a vigorous lustre besides, and thin spots will at once begin to fill with new hair. This is done by simply adding one ounce of beta-quinol to a half pint of water and a half pint of bay rum. If you prefer you may use a full pint of witch hazel instead of the water and bay rum. The beta-quinol may be procured for fifty cents at any drug store. Try this and you will no longer find handfuls of hair coming out on your comb and brush, and your hair will be the envy of all your friends.

A Sure Way to Remove Wrinkles

It is really inspiring to know that removing wrinkles now depends almost entirely upon yourself. Just a few minutes' trouble at the start, and more than half the battle is over. It will take but a few moments for you to make a mixture of two ounces of eptol, a little water and glycerine. The eptol can be obtained from your druggist for fifty cents. This cream produces startling changes in the skin in a short time. It renders the skin plump and youthful, very girlish, and the result is that wrinkles fill out and disappear. It will make you look many years younger if you will only use it faithfully.

Secret about Washing Hair

Every scalp has constantly forming on it a thin, invisible film of fatty accumulations which soap cannot remove, not even with hard rubbing. The one way to remove this film, and let your hair breathe is to dissolve it. This is done by the use of a teaspoonful of eggol dissolved in a half cup of hot water, and used as a shampoo and headwash. This unseals the pores, and it will surprise you what a tremendous difference it produces in the appearance and growth of the hair. There is no more luxurious head-wash possible, and it is, besides, very economical. In a twenty-five cent package of eggol, which can be secured at any drug store, there is enough to supply you with over a dozen of these shampoos.

To Remove Superfluous Hair

There is a very remarkable way to remove superfluous hair. This is becoming exceedingly popular, because it is as easy and pleasing to use as a face lotion, and dissolves away the hair instead of burning it off as many other depilatories do. Simply moisten the hairs with a little sulfo solution. The hairs begin to shrivel. You can see them dissolve, and then with just a swish of the finger, all the hairs can be rubbed off clear and clean. It leaves the skin thoroughly free from all superfluous hairs, not leaving even a suggestion that you had any superfluous hairs at all. It is glorious. Every woman should have some sulfo solution on her dresser. It will cost one dollar at any drug store, and will last for a considerable time.

Blackheads Go in a Few Minutes

It is only a question of a few moments to get rid of blackheads. The only thing that will do this is neroxin. You sprinkle a little neroxin on a wet cloth or sponge and rub the blackheads with this for a few moments. Looking in your mirror, you will find the blackheads gone. This is a very remarkable article, and you need no longer use tonics, face-steaming, and pinching, and other useless methods for many months at a time. For fifty cents you can get the neroxin from your druggist.

NOTE—The articles mentioned herein have come into such demand because of their effectiveness that you can obtain them at any drug store. But if your druggist cannot supply you, arrangements have been made to send any of these articles by mail, charges paid, on receipt of price, by addressing "Secretary to Madam Maree, 600 Thompson Building, Chicago.

for a weak, ailing woman when it is impossible to get competent help. There are so many things to be done and if a man has to work indoors, and out too, it is too much for him. And on the average farm the work isn't made any easier for women. So many of them do not have any conveniences or labor-saving devices. Of course all farms can't have electricity and gas but on the majority of farms the work could be made considerably easier for the woman and so many who are not able to do their work do not have the help and kindness I had. My husband could (and did when I was not able) wash, iron, churn, cook, sweep and scrub and did it willingly and cheerfully. But when he was advised to take me to a different place for my health he also did that cheerfully.

In regard to Bachelor Bill paying his wife like a hired girl, that would be far, far better than expecting her to get along without any money at all as some men do, but I think the one pocketbook plan is the best. But the woman should know how to spend the money to good advantage when she has the privilege of using it. When my husband gets his pay he gives it to me. I use what I need and so does he. What we don't need goes into the bank and when he gives it to me he knows I will not spend it foolishly. If I did I could not expect him to trust me with it.

Someone said she didn't iron her towels, winter underwear and such articles. You're not the only one, sister. Many a time I do not and I'm not ashamed of it, either. When we know we must make our work easier or suffer for it we would be foolish to choose the latter, yet some will it seems.

To the sister who thinks of leaving her husband I would say she should consider it well before doing so and make sure she will be happier. Of course some men are almost impossible to live with, because they are thoughtless and do not understand, but no woman should be treated like a slave.

Love to all. HOPE.

GARY, 315 Marshall St., IND.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Since writing to dear old COMFORT we have moved from Decatur, Indiana, to this city, which is called the "Mushroom City" on account of its rapid growth. There is every kind of work here for men. Girls, too, can make a good living.

The homes here are controlled by The American Bridge Company and are occupied by the employees of that company. My husband is a rivet maker. We have a lovely five-room flat in a two-apartment house. Have separate basement and furnace so are under no obligations to the other party. Have gas and electric lights, with bathroom. Rent is $22.00 per month. Living is no higher here than it is any place. A man that can't make good here needn't think of trying anywhere else.

It is rather nice to welcome the brothers into our circle. But boys, be careful, this is leap year and in our circle there are some—old maids, shall we call them? Anyway, I have received letters from two of them ever since my first letter was published and they are fine girls—just lovely unmarried women who never happened to meet Mr. Right. But there is a mate for everyone somewhere and if it is God's will that they go through life single it is because he has some special work for them to do that they can do better than some other woman. For one thing, there is that work of love—nursing. It is as noble a profession as there is. Should death separate my husband and me (and that's

Naughty, Naughty Greenwich Village

By Frances L. Garside

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

HISTORIES of New York City relate that the first settlement of white men on Manhattan Island was in the neighborhood of the Battery, and the second was two miles above, originally a collection of Indian tents called Sappolkanican, but later settled by the whites and renamed Greenwich Village.

There were beautiful lawns, fine country homes and flowers, and in 1816 a stage line was established connecting the city of New York with Greenwich, and the blowing of horns on the approach of the stage occasioned the town's greatest excitement.

But while New York was progressing in one direction, it was backward in many ways. Its sanitary conditions were deplorable, and a climax was reached in "the yellow fever year of 1822." All who could get out of the pestilential hole moved on foot, in carts and in carriages up Broadway to the more healthful Greenwich Village. Consequently, Greenwich Village grew like magic, but it grew in its own peculiar way, and, later, when New York reached it, absorbed it, and passed on above it, its streets, having followed a direction of their own, could not be made to harmonize with those of the new town. Which explains why West Fourth and West Tenth Streets in Greenwich, instead of running parallel, cross each other, and why other streets are as uncertain in their course as the trail of a wobbly-legged calf.

Though a little triangular piece of green called Abingdon Square is all that is left of the original town, the people who live there continue to call a collection of quaint, tumbledown houses Greenwich Village, and, like the streets, to defy every tradition in the manner in which they conduct their lives.

Originally, a settlement of retired aristocrats, it has become, in the topsy-turvy trend of the years, a haven for the artistic, the temperamental, the reformer, the misunderstood, and the bomb thrower. Every one who despises the old order of things, from the dedication on the household altar of Monday to the wash-tub, to the insistence that father married mother, drifts into Greenwich Village, begins to talk in a loud voice and to look with scorn upon those who live up-town, who get married by a preacher, who keep their stockings darned, and who do other sacredly commonplace things.

They have cook stoves in their apartments in Greenwich, but as a cook stove represents one variety of the shackles they abhor, they do not cook as women cook in more sane sections, but get most of their meals in greasy, smoking, underground restaurants. This eating away from home does not threaten the life of the family tie, for the reason that there are no family ties in Greenwich.

These restaurants boast of no napkins nor tablecloths. That would be too clean and too conventional. They are usually down a flight of steps that are never swept, and one reaches the eating-room through a long, dark passage, knocking against ash-filled garbage cans on the way.

In the summer the eating place is in a tiny back yard, where one may look up, as from the bottom of a well, to the back windows of adjacent tenements, with their collections of red peppers, mops, dish-pans, etc., cluttering a fire escape, on which is printed in large letters: "Any one placing any incumbrance on this balcony will be fined ten dollars." Washlines float out to a pole in the center, and Father's unpatched underwear flaps beside the silk camisole of his daughter. At least, this is the inference of those who do not know Greenwich Village. Those who know it, know that Daughter, as soon as she reaches the mature age of sixteen, leaves the home nest, and rents an apartment of her own.

"I find," said a girl of seventeen, who had done this, and who told of it as indifferently as if leaving home meant nothing more than an errand to the corner grocery, "that I can be my own individual self in my own home. Parental authority is so stifling to individuality, don't you think?"

And of course, one might go farther, and add that the silk underwear is not Mother's, either. Not many fathers figure in Greenwich Village, and if they do they are of the wild-eyed sort who leave mother away up town.

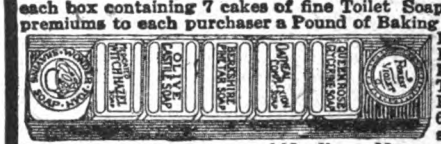
The menus at these restaurants are written in a hand so foreign it is difficult to decipher what one is getting to eat, but it makes little difference for everything is equally poor. Noodles appear on every bill of fare; usually written "nudels," and though tradition demands that they be cut as fine as thread, Greenwich Villagers scoop theirs into their mouths with their knives, unseeing that their "nudels" are cut as wide as a woman's hose supporter, a comparison that would fall flat on their ears for the reason that the women of Greenwich Village do not support their hose. They wear socks, like the men, when they cover their limbs in winter, and in summer they go, as a rule, barelegged with sandals on their feet.

A girl of sixteen at these tables talks to the man who sits next to her, though she never saw him before, on any subject that comes to her mind, and she talks like a parrot, and doesn't know it. Birth control seems to be a favorite topic in Greenwich. If one asks where are the mothers of these too-progressive young things, one is reminded that that is a terribly old-fashioned question, and that one never asks it in Greenwich.

All the women talk a great deal about the spiritual freedom of living their own lives. They cut their hair short, smoke cigarettes, adopt unconventional attitudes in perching on tables and chair backs, and show a length of leg never equalled on Fifth Avenue, with this amusing difference: the hosiery in Greenwich is sexless. Coarse cotton socks, that usually have holes in them, and that won't stay up, remind one more of a boy than of a girl, and have none of the allurement of perfectly fitting silken hose in straighter-laced sections.

The women do their laundry work on Sunday, being too busily engaged in stewing over the world's soiled linen throughout the week to attend to their own. Most of the villagers regard a church as a relic of barbarism, but they are unfailingly kind to the man in trouble, which atones for their lack of religion in some measure. It is in Greenwich where a man will give a friend all the money he has, and as that is usually very little, will throw in next week's pay check, and borrow money to go on himself till another pay day comes around.

Greenwich Village is the place where the women think that if a woman wants a child, she need not wait for marriage to give her the privilege of child birth. Just select the man, and rent an apartment in Greenwich, and be fully as respectable as those on the floor below.



They are the sort of people there who blame the power of the man higher up for their own failures, and despise him for his success. They are artists who never sold a picture; poets who never sold a poem; anarchists who think a soap box on the street corner is the foundation of freedom. Not many of them are really bad, but they think they are very, very wicked, and enjoy the thought that they have broken away from the "narrowing" influence that condemns their opinions.

They are a people who are intoxicated with their own emotions, and think it is the big world outside of Greenwich that is drunk.

Our Presidents' Pet Names

By Carl Lowden.

THE champion nickname-holder among our Presidents was the man who lived in the White House when North and South battled. George Alfred Townsend, a Philadelphia newspaper man, originated the title of "Father Abraham." The slaves he freed called him "Marsa Linkum" and "The Great Emancipator," whereas the public affectionately designated him as "The Rail Splitter" and "Honest Abe."

"No other terms than unconditional and immediate surrender," General Grant told the commander of Fort Donelson, and thereby obtained the sobriquet of "Unconditional Surrender," of which the beginning letters coincided with his name of Ulysses Simpson. He was also known as "Fight It Out All Summer," "Old Three Stars," and "The Hero of Appomatox."

The only President who never essayed the hazard of matrimony was James Buchanan. "The Bachelor President" fit him snugly. Some persons referred to him as "Buck," and he himself in a message bestowed the name of "Old Public Functionary."

The panic of 1837 caused Van Buren's defeat as a candidate for a second term as the nation's executive. Though he fell from public favor, his adherents continued to call him "Matty," "Little Van," "The Little Magician," and "The Wizard of the Kinderhook," which was the name of his birthplace in the state of New York.

As a debater and orator, John Quincy Adams had few peers; he was therefore justly entitled to the name of "Old Man Eloquent." Friends also dubbed him "Publicola" and "Tribune of the People," which harked back to the Roman era.

Isaac Hill, of New Hampshire, first gave the sobriquet of "Old Hickory" to Andrew Jackson, who in an arduous campaign set his men the example of eating hickory-nuts rather than suffer from lack of food. To the Indians he was "Pointed Knife" and "Sharp Arrow."

"Old" is often used to designate admiration, so President Zachary Taylor became "Old Zach." His victory at Buena Vista in the Mexican War resulted in his soldiers calling him "Old Buena Vista" and "Rough and Ready."

A tall man was Thomas Jefferson, and this personal characteristic found expression in "Long Tom." His wisdom and his policy of government were reflected in "The Sage of Monticello" and "The Father of Expansion."

Washington became known here and abroad as "The Father of His Country." Certain wits featured the fact that he married a widow, who had children of her own, and therefore they humorously nominated him, "The Stepfather of His Country." Byron, the poet, alluded to him as "The Cincinnatus of the West."

"Tippecanoe and Tyler too," was the campaign slogan of 1840. William Henry Harrison, a valiant Indian fighter, won the battle of Tippecanoe and became popularly known under that name. After thirty days in the White House, Harrison died. He was succeeded by Tyler, who shared the title of "Young Hickory" with Polk, who followed him as President.

Because he had been in the days of his youth a mule driver along a Canal, James A. Garfield bore the name of "Boy from the Towpath." Chester A. Arthur, his successor, was a handsome personage whom his friends called "Prince Arthur" and "Our Chet."

"The Man of Destiny" and "The Stuffed Prophet" were bestowed upon Cleveland. Benjamin Harrison, grandson of Tippecanoe," certainly looked the part of "Little Benny," as the distance from the sole of his feet to the top of his head did not exceed five feet and four inches.

Theodore Roosevelt organized a regiment of cowboys and adventurers who participated in the war with Spain and earned for him the title of "Rough Rider." While in office he was known as "Wielder of the Big Stick," and now everybody readily comprehends "The Colonel," "T. R.," and "Teddy."

As he resembled the fighting Frenchman, his friends called McKinley "The Napoleon of Canton." Among his associates, William Howard Taft answers to the name of "Bill."

Comfort Sisters' Corner

the only thing that ever will) and I am young enough to enter a hospital for training, that is where you will find me, unless my father should want me to keep house for him. I could content myself to do that, for next to husband, in one way, and better than all in another, he is the dearest on earth to me.

Sisters, while some of you are watching the faults of your husbands grow larger, turn your eyes on yourself awhile. Go to husband and ask him if there is any trait of character about you that he would like to have different. I have heard women say when telling about a quarrel they had with their husband, "I saw afterward where I was wrong but I wouldn't let him know it for the world." Why not? "Nine times out of ten" if she would go to husband and admit she was wrong and ask to be forgiven he would gather her in his arms and tell her he was a brute to quarrel with her and that she is the sweetest little woman in the world. Try it and see. And for goodness sake, don't go to your neighbors and tell your troubles for it will never stop there but keep spreading and getting larger and finally it will reach husband's ears—then what will he think of you? Just what he ought to think; that you are nothing but a gossip yourself. If a woman tells unkind things about her husband and still keeps on living with him, he certainly can't be so bad and she isn't worthy of his support. If she has to do the supporting it is a different thing, if he is able to work and won't. Support yourself and babies (if any) and let him hunt up his own eats. But if he is ill, do all that you can for him and then some. I also think that if a woman can do some kind of work that will bring in extra money and can do it without injuring her health or neglecting her home it is all right for her to do it and husband will strive all the harder when his wife is pulling by his side. And what shows more love than to share the troubles, joy and sorrow of those we love? When my husband comes home at night he is tired and hungry and I always try to have some little extra dish for supper that he likes but wasn't expecting. He carries his dinner.

I received a great number of interesting letters in response to my other letter and would be glad to hear from others, but those writing to ask for money or old clothes needn't write. I have given away everything I have to give and I don't know whether you are really in need or not, unless you send a statement signed by some responsible person. I don't see how any one can expect a soldier's wife to have very much money or clothes even if he has been discharged.

Yes, Ed, I would be just as jolly if my name were Cross. It is the person that makes the name, not the name that makes a person.

Sincerely your COMFORT sister,

CELIA JOLLY.

FREEPORT, TEXAS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I wouldn't attempt to write a letter for the public to read if I didn't hope it would influence some one else to help build a home for Uncle Charlie. I had intended to help but it is so easy to put off doing the things we should do, and when I learned that the Home Fund had been revived again I decided to write and send my contribution, five dollars, at once, and if five hundred COMFORT readers will give that much apiece I'll send five dollars more. I am a widow and working for myself and twelve-year-old daughter.

I enjoyed the descriptive letter from Salt Lake so much that I'll tell you about Freeport and how it helped Uncle Sam win the war, although it isn't on the map yet.

It is a beautiful little town in the southeastern part of Texas, on the Brazoz River, three miles from where it empties into the Gulf of Mexico. The largest and most important sulphur mines of the world are here which made this a very important place during the war. It was well guarded, for Uncle Sam needed the sulphur to make ammunition and all kinds of explosives. They run steam down to the sulphur in the ground through pipes and melt it and then it is forced to the surface in liquid form and into vats about the size of a large two-story brick store-room, where it becomes as hard as rock and has to be blasted before it can be shipped.

A man whose business it is to build the sulphur vats told me they kept them a few planks higher than the sulphur and when they get ready to blast the planks are taken away. This morning the sun is shining on two mounds that have been stripped of the planks and it looks like pure gold. It is refined here too and made into round sticks or cakes to be shipped away.

This is a healthy country and the gulf breeze is delightful. Flowers bloom all winter. What cold weather we have is biting because the air is so salty that it makes you think you are in an ice cream freezer. It lasts only a few days though and a very little fire will make a room comfortable. Last winter we used only coal oil heaters and then only a few times.

We have a magnificent schoolhouse and four nice churches, Episcopal, Baptist, Presbyterian and Methodist and the Catholics are going to build a church soon.

I wish I could describe the clouds here, which are beautiful.

Sincerely, MRS. D. F. BROWN.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I want to impress the simple "Thank you" on some of our readers. It costs nothing to say it yet how often it is forgotten. Some years ago I had a letter in COMFORT and as a result I was showered with letters, about 300 is putting it mildly. In reply I sent to several, books, patches of all kinds, magazines, clothing, seeds and even small sums of money. Would you believe that not one of them acknowledged the remembrance with a simple thank you?

Has everyone read the first line of the story in January COMFORT on page 16? Try it and see if it does not work wonders.

Mrs. W. C. G., you want to know the art of china painting. I started to paint when fourteen years of age and have painted for fifteen years. You cannot learn china painting in any other way than to be taught by some experienced teacher. You must have "china paints," oils, firing china and a kiln for firing. China, as well as some of the materials, were scarce during the war, as these came from foreign countries. China painting is very interesting work and the main object is putting the colors on lightly as they fire out hard. According to the objects, flowers, scenes and fruit, the china must be fired several times, painting over each successive time. It is very different from either oil or water colors, as I have been doing all three and one must have more or less knowledge for sketching.

Almost everybody tries in some way to reduce the high cost of living. Here are my suggestions: Instead of using butter for shortening in cakes, I take six pounds of beet fat, rendered, and while still warm add one pound of butter, or less. This can be used on top of coffee cakes and is better than a butter substitute. In all ordinary cooking I use plain beef fat.

In spring I put up eggs for winter use. This is a suggestion for city folks as those on the farms are supplied with fresh eggs the year 'round. I put them in water glass and they are still "fresh" in a year.

Even though I live in a large city I make my own soap out of drippings, fats off the gravies, candle ends, etc. It's lots of fun and though it takes a long time to save fats it pays in the end as home-made soap lasts longer than ordinary soap.

My best wishes to Mrs. Wilkinson and all the COMFORT readers.

A WISCONSIN SISTER, M. B.

HARDWICK, VT.

HELLO GIRLS:

I do love the Sisters' Corner and the interesting letters and Mrs. Wilkinson's replies.

NOT MORE THAN ONE FREE TRIAL BOTTLE TO ANY FAMILY

I will send anyone anywhere one free Bottle of my Syrup Pepsin—What is Your Address?

THERE is someone in every family who is constipated, bilious, dyspeptic. They need my Syrup Pepsin and will be better off for using it. It may be a woman, an old man, a tiny baby. Syrup Pepsin is as effective for grownups as it is safe for babies. Thousands of mothers can testify to that.

Perhaps you have reached the stage where you take pills every night and think there is nothing else for you to do. Don't believe it! No matter how chronically constipated or dyspeptic you are, Syrup Pepsin will regulate you. It is a combination of simple laxative herbs with pepsin that acts on the stomach and intestines, and in a short time trains the digestive organs to do their work naturally and without help.

YES. I TAKE MY OWN MEDICINE!

I know what old people suffer with their bowels for I have been a family physician in my county since 1875, and I am old myself, past 80 years of age; born 1839, and still strong. I don't know of a remedy that is better for old people than my Syrup Pepsin, and I'll tell you why: It is mild and gentle in action; it doesn't gripe, and it doesn't lose its effect when you take it regularly. I know this by using it myself, by prescribing it since 1875 and by manufacturing it since 1892. You can form your own opinion by sending for a free trial bottle.

WHO NEEDS SYRUP PEPSIN

I want to send a free trial bottle of my Syrup Pepsin to anyone who suffers from one or more of the following: Constipation, indigestion, dyspepsia, biliousness, headache, belching, bad taste, bad breath, dizziness, drowsiness, and the many other symptoms of sluggish bowels. If you have children who suffer in this way write for them.

DR. W. B. CALDWELL
"As I Am To-day"

SEND FOR A FREE TRIAL BOTTLE

In spite of the fact that my Syrup Pepsin is on sale in every drug store in the U. S., I want you to become acquainted with it at my expense, and then, if you find it as I claim, buy it of your nearest dealer. Just now send me your name and address in any way most convenient to yourself, by filling out the coupon below, by postal or letter. I have given many thousands of these bottles away and I know you will appreciate it as keenly as others have. Address me today.

SELF-FILLING

Fountain Pen

For A Club Of Three

HERE is a fountain pen that we can positively guarantee. Perhaps you have had some experience with fountain pens which never would write well and continually leaked ink all over your fingers. If so you will certainly appreciate this opportunity to secure a fountain pen that has none of these defects. Our illustration is of course greatly reduced in size. The pen offered you here is 6½ inches long, made entirely of hard rubber, finely finished, and the pen point is genuine 14-K gold. The feeding device is perfect, permitting a uniform flow of ink and it will not leak. Also please notice that this is a self-filling pen. You can fill this fountain pen in less than 10 seconds by pressing down the spring on the side, then placing the pen point in a bottle of ink, after which you release the spring and the pen is instantly filled with ink to its full capacity. If given proper care this pen should last anybody for years. If you will accept the following special offer we will send you one of these self-filling fountain pens with a positive guarantee that if it fails to prove satisfactory in any way you may return it to us and we will replace it with a new pen free of charge.

Genuine Gold Filled

Guaranteed For 5 Years

Gold Birthstone Rings

THE most popular ladies' rings worn today are these beautiful birthstone rings. Not only is it considered lucky to wear one of them but they are now and always will be exceedingly stylish. We are able to illustrate only three of the rings but there are twelve in all—a different stone for each month of the year, and of course you should wear the stone that is symbolical of the month you were born. The following is a list of the twelve rings, names of the stones and the month to which they apply:

No. 8411, January, Garnet. No. 8421, February, Amethyst. No. 8431, March, Bloodstone. No. 8441, April, Diamond. No. 8451, May, Emerald. No. 8461, June, Agate. No. 8471, July, Ruby. No. 8481, August, Sardonyx. No. 8491, September, Sapphire. No. 8501, October, Opal. No. 8511, November, Topaz. No. 8521, December, Turquoise.

Each ring is guaranteed genuine gold filled, which looks exactly like solid gold and will wear for years. In fact we absolutely guarantee each ring for at least five years. The rings themselves are perfectly plain, the stones are solitaires and perfect imitations of the real gems. The setting of each ring is the ever popular "Tiffany" style. As a Christmas, Birthday or all-the-year-round gift for wife, mother, sweetheart or sister, nothing could be more appropriate and acceptable than one of these beautiful guaranteed rings set with the birthstone of the person to whom it is given. We will send you one of these rings free upon the terms of the following offer:

Given To You! For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents we will send you one of these beautiful gold-filled Rings by parcel post, prepaid. Please be sure to give size and number of ring wanted.

Six Silver Teaspoons

The Beautiful "Morning Glory" Design

BY buying in large quantities we are enabled to offer our readers this handsome set of six teaspoons for the ridiculously small club mentioned below. They are six inches long, silver plated on a white metal base, so there is no brass to show through, and they will never have that dingy or tarnished appearance even after years of constant use. The design is the beautiful "Morning Glory" deeply embossed on the handles which are finished in soft, elegant French grey. The bowls of the spoons are perfectly smooth and bright polished.

The rich design and splendid wearing qualities of these teaspoons combine to make this the most attractive premium offer in years. Our illustration does not do them justice. They must be seen to be appreciated. We know they will exceed your highest expectations.

Given To You! For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will send you six of these fine Silver Plated Teaspoons free by parcel post, prepaid. Premium No. 9682.

Given To You Three Beautiful PEONIES

WHITE - PINK - RED

GORGEOUS, yearly-blooming Peonies—the rival of the finest roses in size, form and color. The three varieties offered you here require but little care and attention after once being planted; they thrive anywhere, even in the coldest climates, and produce more and more flowers every season. We will send you the roots, packed in damp moss, direct from the greenhouse. You can put them in the ground at once and next summer you will know the pleasure and satisfaction of having a beautiful garden of peonies in the most glorious shades of white, pink and red. The three different varieties sent you free on this offer include

Couronne d'Or A white, semi-rose Peony that blooms in early summer, bearing immense, very full, imbricated, ball-shaped blossoms which are very solid and compactly built from edge to center. Their color is a snow-white, reflecting golden-yellow stamens that show through the petals when looking at the flower from the side. These stamens light up the whole flower with a glow that is simply indescribable and which suggests its name "Crown of Gold." Delicate carmine pencilings also appear on the edges of a few central petals. This variety is incomparably lovely and one of the best and choicest Peonies in culture.

Mademoiselle Desbuissons A pink semi-rose Peony that blooms in mid-season. Its flowers are very large, full and elegantly shaped, imbricated and flat with extra large petals of a tender, glossy pink color. The center is a delicate waxy white, the guards a handsome violet-rose color. Flower lovers pronounce this one of the most beautiful varieties.

L'Ecletante A red Bomb type Peony that blooms well into the summer. Its blossoms are very double and full. The color is a deep, brilliant, velvety-crimson. This variety makes a stately and handsome plant, every flower standing up straight and erect, well above the foliage. It is considered as one of the finest red Peonies ever grown.

The roots of these plants are all extra strong and each one contains from two to five eyes. We guarantee that they will reach you in a healthy-growing condition, ready to be placed in the ground and that they will positively bloom next season. If for any reason they do not—or if they should otherwise prove unsatisfactory—we will replace them for you free of all cost.

As the best season for planting Peonies is right now, you should send in your order at once. We will send you these three above described varieties—one white, one pink and one red—free upon the terms of the following special

CLUB OFFER! For three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you the healthy, well-formed roots of the three beautiful varieties of Peonies described above, free by parcel post, prepaid. They will be mailed, carefully packed, direct from the greenhouse, and delivered to you in perfect condition, all ready for planting. Premium No. 8983.

Handsome Stamped Pillow-Top With Back and Fringe

A DESIGN that will appeal to all lovers of home. A comfortable, old-fashioned farmhouse, the well with the "old oaken bucket," and a cluster of handsome American Beauty roses. The stamping is done in natural colors on tan art crash, 17x21 inches, these colors acting as a guide to the embroiderer. Or, if desired, the whole design may be simply outlined in black. If embroidered, the roses should be worked in red and pink, using the outline stitch for all but the light part, which should be worked solid. The leaves are to be outlined in green, the stems in brown. Work the house, well and surroundings in outline in colors corresponding to those stamped. The words "Home Sweet Home" are to be done in black in solid embroidery and outline stitch. We will send you this handsome stamped pillow-top with back and fringe upon the terms of the following offer:

Given To You! For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will send you this Pillow Top with back and fringe free by parcel post, prepaid. Premium No. 9242.

Best Way of Doing Things Around The Home

To remove mildew, use soap and powdered chalk after wetting garment.

Use a putty knife for scraping food from dishes. —BILLY, Middlebranch, Ohio.

A stubby old whisk broom is a great help in washing pans and kettles and never injures the dishes.

After making ice cream, empty the cracked ice into a sack and when it melts nearly all the salt will remain to be used again.

Wash linoleum with either sweet or sour milk and it will look better than when washed with soap and water.—O. P. COBB, Calif.

Make small platforms with castors on them for your meal and flour barrels and you will find it easier to clean around them.—LONESOME GIRL, Juno, Tenn.

To remove iodine stain, moisten a piece of bread and place it on the stain; repeat several times; soak in cold water half hour and wash.—WESTERNER, Albin, Wyo.

When gathering goods on sewing machine lengthen the stitch instead of loosening tension. After it is stitched, pull under thread. That makes an even gather.

Cold doughnuts or biscuits may be made to taste fresh by sprinkling lightly with cold water and putting into a paper bag and placing in hot oven for a few minutes.

If a recipe calls for sour milk and you have none, add two teaspoons of vinegar to cup of sweet milk, and as much soda as you would with sour milk.—MRS. STELLA BOYD, Winfield, Ark.

If you are planning to set away the tea or coffee pot for some time, first put in a lump of sugar. This will prevent a musty taste next time the dish is used. —HAZEL HASKINS, New Auburn, Wis.

Four wooden tipped bumpers for a door, screwed into the legs of a chair or small table will make it higher, if not right height to be comfortable for your work.—MRS. ROBERT GOLDEN, Cornell, Wis.

To get rid of cabbage worms, sprinkle the cabbages while wet with dew, with pulverized red pepper, three or four mornings in succession. This kills the worms and keeps away the moths that lay the eggs.—JOE MORGAN, Monticello, Ga.

Requests

How to gather and prepare pine needles for cushions. —WESTERNER, Albin, Mo.

Will someone please send me January and February, 1919, numbers of the Metropolitan; also songs, "Mickey" and "Missouri Waltz."—MISS CHRISTINE JOHNSON, Nokomis, R. R. 3, Ill.

Mrs. J. W. Rearden, Bessemer, 234 Jefferson Ave., Ala., wants a COMFORT reader to send her the December number of "The Household."

Wanted: To hear from people living in Southern States, about land, schools, churches, living conditions, etc., with view to making home in South.—FRANK ALLEN, Alton Bay, Box 105, N. H.

Remedies

Nerve poisons do not stain. Two classes:
1. Narcotics. Produce deep sleep and insensibility.
2. Convulsants. Produce convulsions, twitching, delirium and suffocation. (Some poisons are both irritant and nerve poisons.)

1. Sleep producers: Opium, morphine, laudanum, paregoric, soothing syrups, powders, chlorodyne. At first very sleepy, later insensibility, pupils of eye very small, breathing deep, slow and snoring, face first flushed then livid, breath may smell of the poison.
Treatment:
1. Emetic.
2. Keep awake, strong coffee. Slap with wet towel. Walk up and down, supporting on each side.
3. Artificial respiration.

2. Convulsants: Strychnine, belladonna, prussic acid. Strychnine is far more common. Is found in some vermin killers.
Treatment.—In all these poisons one must work quickly. Emetic. Do not wait for it to be prepared but tickle back of throat with finger and keep it there until vomiting occurs. Artificial respiration if breathing stops.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

where I first met you and your "Homeshack" make me wild to get out and share it with you. Just give me a wee bit of encouragement and see how quickly I'd swoop down upon you. Yes, and I believe Mrs. Wilkinson would like to join me. We would have a delightful outing so you'd better put on your best bib and tucker for we are liable to drop in any time. Won't we have a lovely time? Please brush up a little on your music and we will make the woods ring. Did you tell us how many kiddies you have? If you did I have forgotten and wish you would tell us again, also names and ages.

Bachelor Bill, here is another "roast." Let the "long dimmed bright eyes" still shine on you in troubled dreams for otherwise I think the "bright eyes" would have shed tears and become dimmed as your wife. As for the babies whose "concerting" distress your peaceful soul, God bless 'em. What would we do without them? You were a baby once yourself and suppose you were married and Friend Wife had babies to care for, would your conscience allow you to shirk all responsibility onto her shoulders? A man, of course, is privileged to provide or not provide as he sees fit, to dress neatly or slouchily, according to his inclinations, but wife must always be neat and clean, sweet tempered and cheerful, no matter if she has to make one dollar do the work of ten or no matter how sick or fretful the babies are or how hard she works. She is the mother. Why do mothers have babies to look after anyway? And as she is the mother she must keep eternally sweet and neat and charming, but you as her husband, could shirk all responsibility. I'm glad I'm not your wife. I don't doubt but you are a very charming companion for an hour or two and probably as agreeable as the most of us and I'd really like to meet you but don't make the mistake of getting married for you are a confirmed bachelor.

Mrs. Wilkinson is holding the door open for me to go and may God be with you till we meet again.

A LOVER OF OUTDOORS.

Lover of Outdoors.—This is a secret so don't tell anyone, and I may be wrong anyway, but it is my personal opinion that Bachelor Bill is one of the henpecked husbands we read about and that he takes most of the care of their children—their seven children. The things he says to us are the things he'd like to say to his wife but doesn't dare to. And I don't think he is in any danger of losing his scalp for I feel sure he has a shiny bald head. I also think that he is a good kind man, one the neighbors like and trust and children and dogs make friends with, and that, you know, is one test of a good man.—Ed.

THIS IS "Dimples"

The Doll With Long Golden Hair

Reward No. X9722

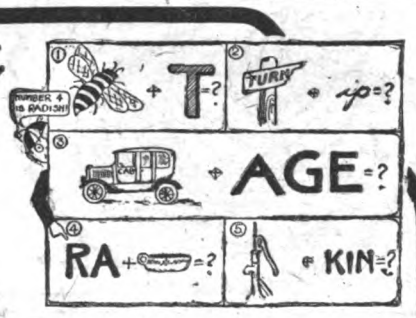
NEARLY ONE FOOT TALL

For a Club Of Two

WE named her Dimples because she is always smiling and so sweet and lovable—just the kind of doll every little girl wants to cuddle in her arms and sing to sleep with tender lullabies. And her hair! You should see her beautiful gold-bronze tresses falling in the dearest curls and ringlets way below her shoulders. As a rule, only the most expensive dolls have such lovely hair. You will never tire of combing it, and just think—you can braid it, too, and fix it all up pretty with ribbon bows.

Dimples also has a strong, indestructible body, with jointed arms and legs so that she will stand up or sit down, just as you please. She is nearly a foot tall, or almost four times as large as she appears in the picture. She comes dressed in a neat, simple one-piece garment but of course she will need a lot of other pretty dresses and you will have just the best fun in the world making them.

We will send Dimples free to any little girl upon the terms of the following special offer.



Given To You. For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will send you this beautiful golden-haired doll free by parcel post prepaid. Reward No. X9722.

SOLVE this PUZZLE

Win Free Auto or $1000

This Puzzle Picture represents the names of five common vegetables grown in almost every garden. Number 4 is "Radish." Can you solve the other four names? If you can you may win a brand new Overland Touring Car or $1000 in Cash.

Only 150 "Points" Wins Auto

For each vegetable name that you solve correctly you will receive 20 "points" or 100 "points" in all if you solve the five names correctly. You can gain 25 more "points" by "Qualifying" your answer, that is, by proving that you have shown a copy of our paper, the Weekly Rural American, to five people. Samples are FREE. The final 25 "points" will be awarded by three prominent, independent judges, for the neatest handwriting, (10 "points), most unique style (10 "points"), and correct spelling, (5 "points") of puzzle solutions received by the Rural American. The answer gaining 150 "points," which is the maximum, wins the Overland or $1000 in cash. Second highest number of "points" will win $250 Diamond Ring and so on down list of 25 valuable prizes. In case of a tie for any prize both winners will receive same prize, just as if there had been no tie. Contest closes November 27th, 1920.

No Costs—You Can Win

You will not be asked or expected to subscribe for the Weekly Rural American in order to win. We have given away over 100 autos and thousands of dollars in other valuable prizes. You may be the next lucky auto winner. Write your solution on one side of paper,—your name and address in upper right hand corner. Do not write anything else on the sheet. Solve the Puzzle now and send your solution to

New Crochet And Sweater Books

HUNDREDS of new, lovely designs for COMFORT crochet workers. The very latest patterns in edges, beadings, insertions and laces, crocheted and knitted sweaters, all with complete directions and illustrated by large, clear photographs of the finished work. Each book is 8 by 11 inches in size, printed on the finest paper, handsomely and durably bound. Following is a brief description of what each book contains:

Book No. 20 shows sixty-two beautiful edges and insertions, both narrow and wide, for every conceivable use, also some handsome crocheted tumbler doilies and medallions. All are illustrated by large photographs, with full directions.

Book No. 21 contains fifty-seven pretty designs in edges and insertions, entirely different from those shown in Book No. 20, all fully illustrated, with full directions. Many of the illustrations show towel, handkerchief and napkin corners complete and there is also a complete alphabet, and an all-crochet plate doily that is simply lovely.

Book No. 22 presents fifty-two new designs in Filet crochet, illustrated, with directions. In this book you will find handsome edges, corners and insertions that you never saw before, alphabets, finished towels, luncheon cloths and napkins, sheets and pillow-cases, dining-room sets, tidies, curtain edges and corners.

Book No. 23 contains seventeen alphabets in various styles and sizes for cross stitch and filet crochet, also wreaths, corners and medallions where the letters are used. Illustrations are all full-page size and very easy to follow.

Book No. 24 contains fifteen artistic yokes shown in large photographic illustrations, with complete instructions. Filet patterns, small medallion schemes, and in braid for round, square, pointed, corset-covers, camisole, night-gown and children's yokes.

Book No. 25 tells how to make knitted and crocheted ripple sweaters and jackets with and without sleeves. Thirteen different styles to choose from and every one a beauty. The stitches are shown in full-page photographs, with full instructions, while the finished articles are also shown by photographs on living models.

Book No. 26 shows thirteen lovely new yokes in filet and fancy crochet with complete instructions and photographic illustrations over one-half actual size. The patterns consist of clover, medallions, filet, knot-stitch, pin-wheel, poinsettia, scalloped filet, and there is also shown one of the new shapes in a filet collar.

Book No. 27 illustrates and tells how to make twelve elaborate medallion arrangements in camisoles and yokes. A feature of this book is the two-page photograph of a beautiful Brassiere or dress trimming. The motifs for yokes include a pretty squared daisy, snowflake, round knot-stitch, pin-wheel, leaf and cross, pineapple, poinsettia, star flower, sunflower, square knot-stitch and round daisy.

Book No. 28 shows how to make filet sweaters, illustrating fourteen handsome designs on living models. These are to be crocheted in dainty light colors for summer wear. Every motif is also pictured by diagram, thus making it very easy to follow the printed instructions.

Book No. 29 contains photographic illustrations and descriptions of tatted yokes and camisoles—fifteen lovely arrangements of medallions in different handsome patterns of pointed, rounded and camisole styles. The illustrations are over half actual size and the directions are full and complete.

Book No. 30 shows seventy-two patterns in edges and corners and insertions. Edges are in all widths—from one half to two inches—and include such novelty designs as "Kiddies' Jumping Rope" and "Little Maids in a Row." Many lovely designs in corners are shown in Torchon, square medallions, knot-stitch and lacet stitch. All are illustrated with half-size photographs with full directions.

Book No. 31 is a book of "spiders," showing this antique design in all its many variations in yokes, corners, edges and insertions. In all, there are twenty-eight different photographic illustrations with directions—six different spider yokes, sixteen different spiders and six ways of turning the corner with a spider.

Book No. 32 contains fourteen filet crochet sweaters, in light and heavy threads, every style shown by photographs on a living model, both front and back views. Every stitch is also plainly shown by photograph and the different motifs are pictured on diagrams with complete directions. Pond lily, wild rose, iris, spray and poinsettia are among the designs shown for long or short, sleeve or sleeveless, belted or unbelted and open front models in cream pink, light pink, blue, light blue, cherry, red, dark green and lavender. The handsomest sweater book ever published.

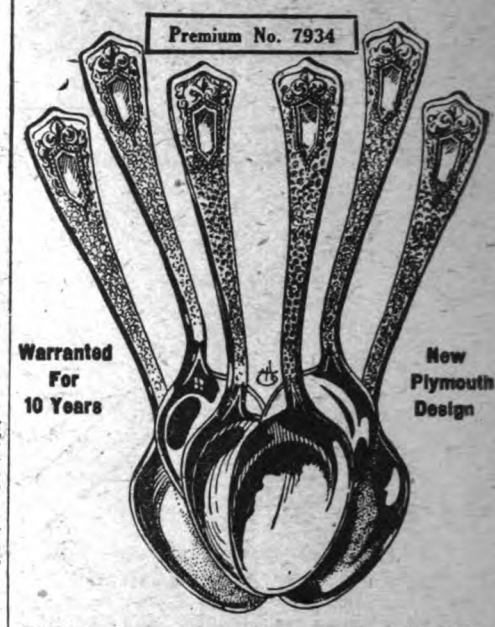
The tassel on the bottom is not necessary but you can easily afford to buy one as they cost only a few cents. Or you can make it yourself.



Use Moire Silk Or Velvet

The bag-top offered you here is seven inches wide, made of handsome oxidized metal with a very deeply embossed floral design. It is the "gate-top" style—that is, each side opens out in the middle so that it really has four sides as shown in the illustration. It is also perforated along the edge with small holes to take the stitches necessary for attaching the bag. The chain is fourteen inches long.

Our Free Offer. For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will send you this handsome and stylish Bag-Top free by parcel post, prepaid. Premium No. 9692.

Six Rogers' Silver Teaspoons

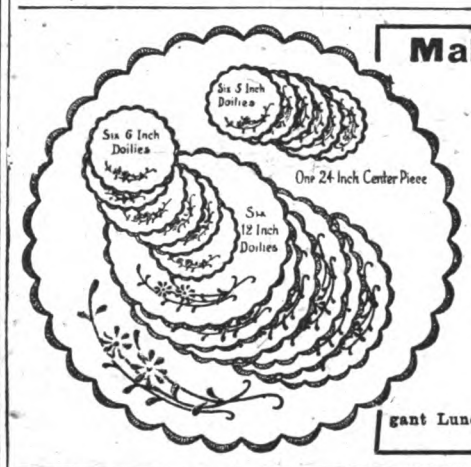
FOR A CLUB OF FOUR

NO woman ever has too many teaspoons—especially the "Rogers'" kind—so here is an offer that will surely interest thousands of our women readers. For a few subscriptions to COMFORT secured among your friends we will send you this handsome set free. They are the famous 1881 Rogers' A1 brand which is guaranteed to be a full standard silver plate upon a genuine 18% nickel base. Please notice the beautiful design—the new "Plymouth"—which is a splendid reproduction of the universally popular hand-hammered ware. You will have to see the spoons themselves in order to fully appreciate this latest fashionable pattern as our illustration does not do it justice.

We will give you this set of six Rogers' silver teaspoons on the terms of the following club offer. Remember—they are the genuine 1881 Rogers' A1 brand—the Rogers' trademark is stamped on each and every one. This protects you fully, furthermore each spoon is absolutely warranted for ten years.

CLUB OFFER. For four one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you this set of six Rogers' Silver Teaspoons free by parcel post, prepaid. Premium No. 7934. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

SCRIM CURTAINS GIVEN!



THE price of cloth has advanced tremendously within the past few years, but that does not prevent us from offering these stylish Scrim Curtains for the ridiculous small club of six. We make no money profit on our premiums — that's the reason. They are full size, each side piece measuring 2½ feet in width and just long enough so they will hang a little below the window sill. The top piece or "valance," as it is commonly called, is 1 1-8 feet wide and 2½ feet long. The insertion is a 3-inch band of Filet lace. The color is White or Ecru—whichever you prefer. These Curtains are all the style now, so don't miss this wonderful opportunity to secure one or more of them absolutely free. And be sure to send in your order at once as our supply is limited.

Given To You. For a club of only six one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you these stylish Curtains free by parcel post prepaid. Be sure to mention color wanted. Premium No. 7756.

Make This Handsome 19-Piece Luncheon Set

We Will Give You The Patterns

ONE 24-inch Centerpiece, six 12-inch Doilies, six 6-inch Doilies and six 5-inch Doilies of the simple yet elegant design shown in our illustration. They can be made of the usual white material, such as linen, Butcher cloth, etc., worked in shades to match dishes used in serving, or of colored material to match decorations in the room, with the flowers embroidered in orange, with brown centers, green leaves and stems. Use buttonhole stitch for the borders, all-over embroidery or satin stitch for the flowers, outline stitch for the stems, and either satin or lazy daisy stitch for the leaves.

Special Offer. For only one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 50 cents we will send you the transfer patterns for this elegant Luncheon Set free by mail postpaid. Premium No. 8381.

26-Piece Table Set

Yours Prepaid For A Club Of Seven

WE have in the past made many offers of table-ware, but this is the first time we have been able to offer a complete set of 26 Pieces in return for so small a club. And please don't think that because we are giving this set on liberal terms that it is plated on a brass base and consequently will change color and have that "brassy" look just as soon as the plating wears off. On the contrary, it has a white metal base; therefore each and every piece is the same color all the way through and will not show signs of wear, even after years of constant use. As shown in the above illustration, there are 26 pieces in this set—6 Knives, 6 Forks, 6 Teaspoons, 6 Tablespoons, Sugar Shell and Butter Knife. Each piece is full regulation size for family use, the handles are handsomely embossed and the blades of the knives and the bowls of the teaspoons and tablespoons are perfectly plain and bright polished. It is only because we buy this set in large quantities direct from the factory that we are able to secure it at a price that enables us to offer it as a premium for so few subscriptions. It is by far the greatest value we have offered and we guarantee every Set sent out for a period of five years. We will send this 26-Piece Table Set exactly as illustrated and described to any address upon the terms of the following special

Club Offer. For a club of seven one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each, we will send you this 26-Piece Table Set free by parcel post, prepaid. Premium No. 7397.

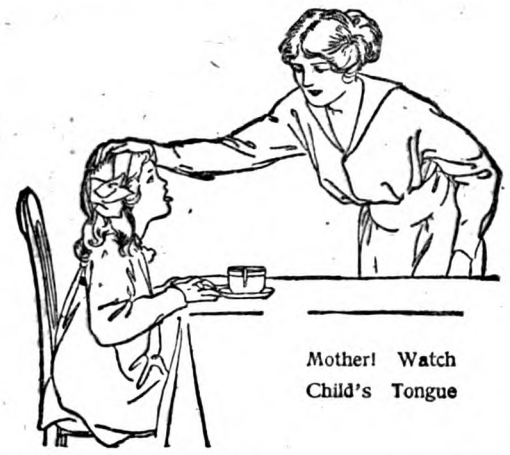
Stylish Bead Necklace



Jade, Coral, Amber, Blue and Red — For a Club Of Two

THE great popularity of these new style necklaces leads us to make this offer to our women and girl readers. In fact, there seems to be a veritable CRAZE for these beautiful, large, odd-shaped beads, which come in different colors to match the costume, and of generous length, so that they hang well down the front of the dress. They are not strung on string or wire but are fastened together with tiny, glittering, silver-colored rings, which form a pleasing contrast with the rich, subdued colors of the beads themselves. Some of these necklaces—which, by the way, retail as high as $5.00—are enormous in size, others are quite small; we picked out a medium size, thinking it would please the greater number of our readers. It is 30 inches long, two of the beads are larger than the rest, as shown in the illustration, while at the very end and serving as a pendant, there hangs a large, handsome, oblong-shaped bead an inch and a quarter long. The smaller beads in this necklace are each five eighths of an inch long and there are forty-two beads in all.

We will send you one of these handsome and stylish necklaces—your choice of red, blue, amber, coral and jade—upon the terms of the following offer.

Given To You! For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each we will send you this Necklace free by parcel post, prepaid. Please be sure to mention color wanted. Premium No. 9232.

Ceurage Killed Cowardice

By Isabel Gordon Curtis.

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

Text—Let some affectionate Goliath get himself tied to a small, tender thing, dreading to hurt it by pulling and dreading still more to snap the cord, and which of the two, pray, will be master? —George Eliot.

THE young stenographer rose slowly from her chair, slid a cover over her typewriter, lifted her hat from its peg and looked into the eyes of her employer.

"Mr. Wyman." The girl's chin quivered. "You don't know how I hate to say it, but I cannot work for you another day."

"What do you mean?" The man's question was like the snap of a whip.

"Exactly what I said." The girl began to draw on a glove.

"Is it salary? Because if it is——"

"No, sir. Do you want me to be frank with you?"

"Perfectly frank. After being my right hand for years, I cannot understand. What is the trouble?"

"You, sir."

"I——I! For Heaven's sake, what do you mean? Sit down." He pointed to a chair. "Out with everything that is on your mind."

"I will," said the girl slowly. "It is fair to both of us that I should. You know I came straight here from school, when you were a junior partner, and I was so delighted when you picked me out from the force in the front room. The rest of the girls envied me, you were always so considerate and kind. It was not wholly for salary I worked, it was to please you. After you married, I began to notice a change in you. It came gradually, but today——" the girl's voice choked. "Oh, sir, it is so hard to put it into words, you have grown so nervous and impatient and so hard to please and so—so—different that I cannot stand it longer."

"Good Lord," whispered the man, "has it come to this?" He rose and began to pace the room. "You have been frank with me. I will be equally frank with you. Home is hell! When I turn the key in the door, I know what I will meet,—nagging and whimpering about things I can't help; bad servants, unpleasant neighbors, tradesmen who cheat, dressmakers who do not keep their appointments, the kitchen boiler has burst or the furnace man has not come and the house is as cold as Spitzbergen. If I don't do my duty, night after night—my duty consists of appearing somewhere at a dinner, a dance, a reception or the theater—I am heartless, selfish, cruel! I end up by going, and it is morning before we come home. Ten to one my wife has driven sleep away and one of her dreadful headaches begins. Daylight often finds me playing nurse. Last night I did not go to bed at all. At last I left her asleep. She can sleep till night. I can't. So——I come down here and I take it out on my employees. I did not realize it had come to such a pass. A new leaf has got to be turned over," he smiled grimly, "if not for her sake and for mine, then for the people who work for me. There is no excuse for my cowardice except that she is such a delicate, fragile shred of a thing I have not been able to screw up courage to discipline her. Now——it has to be done. You are a brave little woman to speak up as you did. I honor you for it. Give me one more chance," he begged. "You have taught me a lesson."

Wyman stretched out his hand with a boyishly, eager gesture, which the stenographer had not seen for years. She gripped his fingers cordially for a moment then pulled off her glove and hung her hat back on its peg.

"I am ready now to answer that letter, sir," she said as she lifted a notebook. "You stopped at, 'I expect to be in New York next week, when I will endeavor to see you.'"

Poems Requested

The following poems have been requested by readers of COMFORT and sent for publication.

Waiting

Serene, I fold my hands and wait,
Nor care for wind, or tide, or sea;
I rave no more 'gainst time or fate,
For, lo, my own shall come to me.

I stay my haste, I make delays,
For what avails this eager pace?
I stand amid the eternal ways,
And what is mine shall know my face.

Asleep, awake, by night or day,
The friends I seek are seeking me;
No wind can drive my bark astray,
Nor change the tide of destiny.

What matter if I stand alone?
I wait with joy the coming years;
My heart shall reap where it has sown,
And garner up its fruit of tears.

The waters know their own and draw
The brook that springs in yonder hight;
So flows the good with equal law
Unto the soul of pure delight.

The stars come nightly to the sky;
The tidal wave unto the sea;
Nor time, nor space, nor deep, nor high,
Can keep my own away from me.

—John Burroughs.

In a Rose Garden

A hundred years from now, dear heart,
We will not care at all;
It will not matter then a whit,
The honey or the gall;
The summer days that we have known
Will all forgotten be and flown;
The garden will be overgrown
Where now the roses fall.

A hundred years from now, dear heart,
We will not mind the pain;
The throbbing, crimson tide of life
Will not have left a stain;
The song we sing together, dear,
The dream we dream together here,
Will mean no more than means a tear
Amid a summer rain.

A hundred years from now, dear heart,
The grief will all be o'er,
The sea of care will surge in vain
Upon a careless shore;
These glasses we turn down today,
Here at the parting of the way,
We shall be wineless then as they,
And shall not mind it more.

A hundred years from now, dear heart,
We'll neither know nor care
What came of all life's bitterness,
Or followed love's despair;
Then fill the glasses up again
And kiss me through the rose-leaf rain;
We'll build one castle more in Spain
And dream one more dream there.

—John Bennett.

A Doctor Man

It's very often that my pa
Stays out all the night long;
They say it ought to worry ma,
'Cause it's jus' awful wrong.
But he don't care what all them folks
Say 'bout it, an' he can
Jus' sit an' laugh at all their jokes,
'Cause he's a doctor man.

"He talks to other wimmen all
Th' time an' ma don't care;
An' every day he makes a call
To see some lady fair.
Th' neighbors says he takes them rides,
Nen he laughs at it an'
Jus' keeps it up an' splits his sides,
'Cause he's a doctor man.

"He holds their hands an' smiles so nice,
An' asks 'em how they feel,
Nen women sneak 'round, sly as mice,
An' give ma a long spiél
'Bout how bad pa is, an' nen she
Jus' laughs and giggles an'
Tells him when he comes home, you see,
'Cause he's a doctor man."

Opportunity

They do me wrong who say I come no more,
When once I knock and fail to find you in;
For every day I stand outside your door,
And bid you wake, and ride to fight and win.

Wail not for precious chances passed away,
Weep not for golden ages on the wane!
Each night I burn the records of the day,
At sunrise every soul is born again.

Laugh like a boy at splendors that have sped,
To vanished joys be blind and deaf and dumb,
My judgments seal the past dead with its dead,
But never bind a moment yet to come.

Though deep in mire, wring not your hands and weep,
I lend my arm to all who say, "I can."
No shamefaced outcast ever sank so deep
But yet might rise and be again a man.

—Walter Malone.

The Night Wind

Did you ever hear the wind go "Yoooooo?"
'Tis a pitiful sound to hear!
It seems to thrill you through and through
With a strange and speechless fear.
'Tis the voice of the night that broods outside
When folk should be asleep.
And many and many's the time I've cried
To the darkness brooding far and wide
Over the land and the deep
"Whom do you want, oh lonely night,
That you wail the long hours through?"
And the night would say in its ghostly way:
"Yoooooo!
Yoooooo!
Yoooooo!"

My mother told me long ago (when I was a little lad)
That when the night went wailing so,
Somebody had been bad
And then, when I was snug in bed,
Whither I had been sent,
With the blankets pulled up round my head
I'd think of what my mother said
And wonder what boy she meant!
And "Who's been bad today?" I'd ask
Of the wind that hoarsely blew,
And the voice would say in its meaningful way:
"Yoooooo!
Yoooooo!
Yoooooo!"

That this was true I must allow,
You'll not believe it, though!
Yes, though I'm quite a model now,
I was not always so.
And if you doubt what things I say,
Suppose you make the test:
Suppose, when you've been bad some day
And up to bed are sent away from mother and all the rest—
Suppose you ask "Who has been bad?"
And then you'll hear what's true;
For the wind will moan in its ruefullest tone:
"Yoooooo!
Yoooooo!
Yoooooo!"

—Eugene Field.

Makes a Family Supply of Cough Remedy

Really better than ready-made cough syrups, and saves about $2. Easily and quickly prepared.

If you combined the curative properties of every known "ready-made" cough remedy, you probably could not get as much real curative power as there is in this simple home-made cough syrup, which is easily prepared in a few minutes.

Get from any druggist 2½ ounces of Pinex, pour it into a pint bottle and fill the bottle with syrup, using either plain granulated sugar syrup, clarified molasses, honey, or corn syrup, as desired. The result is a full pint of really better cough syrup than you could buy ready-made for three times the money. Tastes pleasant and never spoils.

This Pinex and Syrup preparation gets right at the cause of a cough and gives almost immediate relief. It loosens the phlegm, stops the nasty throat tickle and heals the sore, irritated membranes so gently and easily that it is really astonishing.

A day's use will usually overcome the ordinary cough and for bronchitis, croup, hoarseness and bronchial asthma, there is nothing better.

Pinex is a most valuable concentrated compound of genuine Norway pine extract, and has been used for generations to break severe coughs.

To avoid disappointment, ask your druggist for "2½ ounces of Pinex" with full directions, and don't accept anything else. Guaranteed to give absolute satisfaction or money promptly refunded. The Pinex Co., Ft. Wayne, Ind.

This Is "Dimples"

The Doll With Long Golden Hair

Reward No. 9722

For A Club Of Two

WE named her Dimples because she is always smiling and so sweet and lovable—just the kind of doll every little girl wants to cuddle in her arms and sing to sleep with tender lullabies. And her hair! You should see her beautiful gold-bronze tresses falling in the dearest curls and ringlets way below her shoulders. As a rule, only the most expensive dolls have such lovely hair. You will never tire of combing it, and just think—you can braid it, too, and fix it all up pretty with ribbon bows.

Dimples also has a strong, indestructible body, with jointed arms and legs so that she will stand up or sit down, just as you please. She is nearly a foot tall, or almost five times as large as she appears in the picture. She comes dressed in a neat, simple, one-piece garment but of course she will need a lot of other pretty dresses and you will have just the best fun in the world making them.

We will send Dimples free to any little girl upon the terms of the following special offer.

Comfort's League of Cousins

jewels you possessed on the bargain counter and any Tom, Dick or Harry that came along has been allowed to snap them up at bargain rates and he has thrown them aside like an old shoe when he wanted something new, and he always wanted something new. Better stay single, girls, than throw yourselves at a man's head and sink to the level of being his chum (he has a score) and being referred to by him as a "good sport." War has shell shocked the nation and it has practically destroyed all the old moral standards, which must at once be restored if our women are to be placed on their old pedestals and become again our hope and inspiration. The old respect, the old chivalry, the reverence for womanhood is rapidly vanishing. Moral values are scorned, and woman, as all through the ages, is the sufferer. Things that are cheap no one wants except to toy with and cast aside. The joy is in the chase, not the killing. When men were kept on the anxious seat for a year or so, with their hearts banging away at a hundred thrills a minute, never knowing just whether they were or were not going to land that wonderful queen of their dreams, when finally they did get her they appreciated her. Today they can go out and "chum" with a score of girls every night, and the chumming is often so raw that it soon knocks all the bloom off the peach, a bloom that no paint or powder can ever replace. In Japan, the film censor in a brief period removed nearly three thousand kisses from various American films. The Jap was horrified to see the way the American man and woman fussed and slobbered. The Jap did not see a single picture in which an American woman was taking off her husband's shoes and he threw up his hands in horror. There you have too much of the other extreme. When some ten thousand women petition the manager of a famous movie house in one of our big cities to open up a smoking-room where they can puff their cigarettes in content, you may know we are in a new world, a world in which woman, as usual, will be the victim and pay the price. Man is thinking cave-man stuff and woman is encouraging him, and that means the death of sweetness, purity, virtue and romance. It also means the exaltation of the most vicious sex instincts and a world in which wedding bells are a superfluity. There are honest, decent men who want decent women. Uncle Sam should see these people get in touch with one another. Uncle Charlie cannot do it. He will give no addresses and forward no letters. A man does not tell a woman "all of his life" and has no right to expect her to rake up the jazz spots on her past if she has any. There is only one moral standard, not two. Men and women must both live up to that standard—no letting down of the bars for either party.

——, MINN.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

How do you think an army deserter should be treated in this community? Should we who had sons who lost their lives on the battlefields of France respect those who hid in the woods nearly two years and refused to do their bit, never once offering an excuse for not going, while the best class of boys all went? These deserters are now going where they please, having muzzled our public officials so that they don't bother them. They have never been punished for not going and have the face to think hard of those who refuse to respect them as of old. I know you are one man who loves to see justice done and not afraid to express your opinion on any question. I feel sure you will see, as we do who also love justice, that the deserter has surrendered his right to a place in the hearts and homes of the best class of people. Those who love law and order anxiously await your reply through COMFORT. Pay no attention to those who abuse you. Christ and His disciples had the same road to travel, and we are no better than they. With best love,

A COMFORT SISTER.

If the deserters you mention, dear friend, have not been punished there must be something rotten wrong with the officials in your state. There must also be something rotten wrong with anyone who would be such a moral degenerate as to speak to or shelter one of these curs. There ought to be enough ex-service men in your community to make life one round of perpetual joy for these contemptible cooties. The War Department is still hot on the trail of these rascals and will spend any amount of money chasing them to the ends of the earth. If you have not the courage to send the names of these men to the Department of Justice or the War Department, send them on to me, and the authorities will thank me for the information and the patriotic people of your community will not have to live, as they are doing now, under a cloud of disgrace. All you good people seem so helpless when a matter of this kind confronts you and you display moral cowardice in not taking action. You don't seem to realize that the government has hundreds of men rounding up these and other cattle of their kind, and is willing to aid you. The Government can't do everything, but it will do a million times more than it does if you will only help it and realize that it exists. We have some government departments in which men are employed who take a keen delight in doing skilled and dangerous work. These men, no band of politicians, not even the rotten cohorts of our notorious Tammany Hall, where the plums of political patronage are handed out to Pat and Mike and the rest of the boys, while we groan under their misrule, can spoil or swerve from the paths of duty. If you want one or more of these men to put these cowardly scamps where they belong, it is an easy job and you will be as guilty as they if you don't at once put the wheels of the law in motion. Law-abiding citizens should not allow the lawless to terrorize them and they should at once report all infractions of the law to the authorities and remember that if the State won't act, the Federal authorities generally will. Remember that you run no risk in taking action of this kind. Those who attend to these matters proceed about their work without endangering those who give them information—they know their business. Thank you, dear friend, for your kind and encouraging words. The Department of Justice has investigated 275,000 cases of real or imaginary draft evaders. It has convicted and sent to prison 5,000 of these slackers and 30,000 are awaiting trial. Those who deserted after being called in the draft are being handled by the military authorities. Uncle Sam will get 'em all in time but this is patriotic work in which all must help.

CASCARETS

"They Work while you Sleep"

Knock on wood! You're feeling fine, eh? That's great! Keep the entire family feeling that way always with occasional Cascarets for the liver and bowels. When bilious, constipated, headachy, unstrung, or for a cold, upset stomach, or bad breath, nothing acts so nicely as Cascarets. 10, 25, 50 cents.

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs fifty-five cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The fifty-five cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C.," a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, so after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

How to become a Member

Send fifty-five cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine, with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

Uncle Charlie's Poems Is the Best Crop to Harvest

The long evenings are here, the harvest gathered in. You have all you want for the stomach, but the feast is not complete until you feed the mind. Both books free for a club of five. Work for them today.

Snowshoes for Horses

In Norway, where deep snow prevails through the long winters, it has been found expedient to equip the horses with a kind of snowshoe. They are square in shape and usually measure nine and one half inches each way. One piece of pine is used for the main part and three slots are cut in its upper surface to receive the calks of the horseshoe. The fastening is done with a piece of rope, which is permanently secured, by staples, to the platform piece. On the under side of the latter, two cleats are nailed, to prevent slipping, and between the cleats a piece of birch bark is fixed. The smooth side of the bark comes in contact with the snowy ground, so that sticking and forming of crusts is eliminated. A shoe, made on the same principle, is used by the Norwegian farmers and has been found useful for men as well as horses. The idea might be followed by American boys as a diversion from ordinary winter sports.

2 Wheel Chairs in September

568 is COMFORT'S Total to Date

I am sorry the wheel-chair subscriptions for the past month warrant the award of no more than two chairs in September; but I appreciate the fact that it is a busy season on the farm and I have no doubt that the number will increase again to normal, as usual, with the advent of colder weather and less work to be done.

The two September wheel chairs go to Miss Edna Austin, R. R. 5, Box 32A, Paragould, Ark., 118, and Mrs. Nicoline A. Henricksen, Box 525, Eureka, Calif., 63. The figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends for them.

Edna Austin, age 15, is a helpless cripple paralyzed in all her limbs to the extent that she has only partial use of one hand. Her condition is due to infantile paralysis which attacked her when nine months old. This COMFORT wheel chair will be a blessing to her and a help to her mother in caring for her. Mrs. Austin writes that she would have bought the girl a wheel chair long ago but has never been able to spare the money for it. She says that when she saw COMFORT'S wheel-chair offer she found her first means of obtaining this much needed comfort for her daughter.

Mrs. Nicoline A. Henricksen, age 63, is a cripple and unable to walk as the result of the amputation of one leg above the knee about three years ago. To her neighbor, Mrs. Curtis Major, is largely due the credit of having obtained the subscriptions for Mrs. Henricksen's chair.

Do your best, my good friends, this month to make up for lost time in helping on the good work of our Wheel-Chair Club, and God bless your efforts.

Sincerely yours,

W. H. GANNETT,

Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 150 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 50 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

Wheel Chair Is Much Comfort to Crippled Girl

Vernon, Ala.

Dear Mr. Gannett:

Received my Wheel Chair in good condition and am so well pleased with it. It is so much comfort to me and takes so much worry from mother in taking care of me. I thank you and all good friends who helped me to get it, will have my picture taken in it right away and send you one. Sincerely your friend,

Maude Odell Smith.

COMFORT'S Roll of Honor

The Roll of Honor comprises the names of those who have sent five or more subscriptions, or a dollar or more in money, to credit of the Wheel-Chair Club during the month previous. Following each name is the number of subscriptions sent.

Mrs. S. C. Austin, Ark., for Edna Austin, 79 subs; Mrs. Curtis Major, Calif., for Mrs. Nicoline Henricksen, 40 subs; Mrs. Lester McDonald, Ark., for Edna Austin, 34 subs; Mrs. Carrie Blum, S. C., for mother, 21 subs; Thomas David Williams, Ark., for Edna Austin, 20 subs; Mrs. Ella Sherry, 18 subs; Mrs. Dora Moore, Va., for Lettie Moore, 13 subs; Fannie Mitchell, Ky., for general, 12 subs; Mrs. Nettie N. Camron, Ky., for Mrs. Sarah A. Dowdy, 8 subs; Miss Gladys Howard, Ill., for Gladys Allen Howard, 6 subs; Irene Darr, Wyo., for Mrs. Joyce, 2 subs and $5.00; Mrs. E. L. Meetain, W. Va., for Edna Keeler, $1.00 cash; Dr. W. R. Graham, N. C., for Jesse G. Cockram, $1.00 cash; Mrs. Leo Schauf, for Edna Keeler, $1.00 cash; Mrs. Ed. Dean, Calif., for general, $1.00 cash; Miss Mattie Fate, Ark., for general, $1.00 cash. A Comfort friend, Texas for general $1.00 cash.

Comfort Readers Praise "More Eggs"

We wrote to about 2,000 Comfort Magazine subscribers asking what they thought of Reefer's "More Eggs" Tonic. The most enthusiastic answers were received. All told of wonderful increases in egg production. Some said they wouldn't do without it no matter what the cost. Read some of the letters which Mr. Reefer has received from among the 400,000 users of his egg producing tonic. No words or evidence could mean so much as the experience of those who have used Reefer's "More Eggs" Tonic for so many years. One Subscriber wrote:

"Got 117 Eggs Instead of 3"

E. J. Reefer

—thanks to Reefer's "More Eggs" Tonic

Many Comfort readers tell you what Reefer's "More Eggs" Tonic has done for them. The same opportunity is now given to all other Comfort readers who raise chickens and who want to get more eggs and more money from their flocks.

160 Hens—1500 Eggs

I have fed 2 boxes of "More Eggs" to my hens and I think they have broken the egg record. I have 160 White Leghorns and in exactly 21 days I got 125 dozen eggs.—MRS. H. M. PATTON, Waverly, Mo.

Gets 35 Eggs Instead of 5

I have used Reefer's "More Eggs" Tonic only two weeks and can see a great improvement in my hens. I get from 30 to 35 eggs a day now. Before I got 4 or 5 eggs a day.—MRS. W. T. JOHNSON, Box 95, Pelican, La.

Makes Hens Moult Fast

I would not be without "Nore Eggs" if it cost $10 a package. It has hurried the moult for me and all my hens are now laying their full capacity. — JOE MARTIN, West Plains, Mo.

8,988 Eggs from 125 Hens

Since using the "More Eggs" I have got more eggs than any time I have been in the poultry business, about thirty years. Since the 15th of March to November 16th, I have marketed 740 dozen and only 125 hens—MRS. W. S. DEAHL, Exline, Iowa.

Gets Quick Results

The "More Eggs" Tonic I received of you is wonderful. I was getting only 1 and 2 eggs per day, and in less than two weeks was getting 12 and 14 every day. I am recommending it to my neighbors. — Yours truly. MRS. S. L. JETT, Bentwood, Ark.

Banker Endorses "More Eggs"

Some time ago I got from you "More Eggs" and it now means MORE EGGS. I am now fully convinced of its utility. I have 14 pullets and 14 hens one year old, and the first 10 days in December they laid 11 dozen eggs.—Yours very truly, F. POHLAND, President, The Citizen's Bank of Ashland, Oregon.

1,368 Eggs After 1 Package

Last fall I bought a box of your "More Eggs" Tonic and would like to have you know the result. From January 1st to July 1st, my hens laid 1,368 eggs.—A. E. WHITE, Scranton, Pa.

"A Godsend"

"More Eggs" Tonic is a Godsend, writes Mrs. Myrtle Ice, of Boston, Ky.. and she adds, I was only getting 12 eggs a day and now get 50.

Gets 100 Eggs a Day

I have given your "More Eggs" Tonic to my chickens for about two months. It is the best I ever used. My chickens have gained from 20 to 100 eggs a day and are still gaining. I cannot say enough for your "More Eggs" Tonic.—LORENZO BURCH, Hamilton, Ind.

You, Too, Can Get More Eggs

These are but a few of the many, many thousands of letters received from enthusiastic users of Reefer's "More Eggs" tonic. What they have done, you can do; you can make layers out of loafers. A few cents worth of Reefer's "More Eggs" tonic will give you a bigger egg production from your hens than you ever thought was possible. Reefer's "More Eggs" contains every element that goes toward the making of more eggs. It is a concentrated tonic — not a food. It is an efficient regulator, aids digestion, stimulates egg production, builds firm bones and muscles.

This $1.00 Package

I have convinced over 400,000 poultry raisers of the value of my "More Eggs" tonic. If I haven't as yet convinced you, its merely because you haven't given me the chance. I want to convince you; in fact, I am more than anxious that you may know, not from the experience of others alone, but from your own experience, of its great advantage in increasing the egg yield of your hens. Will you give me this chance to prove to you its great merit? My free offer is made in the sincere hope and with the sole purpose of getting you to give me this very opportunity. I know what your verdict will be when you once try "MORE EGGS"—but my great difficulty is to get you to ACT—to get you to decide NOW that you will give "MORE EGGS" an honest and fair trial. Won't you do this—won't you do it when, in your own interest, I offer you a package FREE, just to show you what I can do for you in making your hens lay more eggs? Why doubt? Why delay? Others are getting more eggs than they ever dreamed of getting; you can do the same, and eggs today, you know, represent real dollars.

Results Guaranteed

Read the letter shown above from the Million Dollar Merchants Bank of Kansas City. Your absolute guarantee of satisfaction or your money back.
